PREFATORY.

It is becoming and proper that the author should make a few statements prefatory to the following History of the Counties of Dauphin and Lebanon. It is no easy task to prepare history of any locality, and our labor in the preparation of this volume has not been a light one. We have endeavored to preserve as full a record of the history and biography of the counties of Dauphin and Lebanon as the limits of a volume will allow. Much has been omitted because more important facts have been recorded. A large mass of material has come to our hands, and the difficulty has been what to preserve in these pages, and what to lay aside for future reference. Owing to the voluminous details of the war for the Union, which has increased the size of the volume from eight hundred pages, as promised by the publishers, to over nine hundred pages, we are reluctantly compelled to omit the record of Dauphin County families.

As to the biographical department, it will be found pretty full and complete. For whatever errors of omission or commission there may be in this direction, or in any of the local details, the author does not hold himself responsible—those who could have furnished the information are. Many communications or personal applications remain unanswered to this day.

We have endeavored to be correct in detail as to names and dates in local matters, and yet we fear that through the fault of those whose duty it was to furnish such data there may be errors, and we therefore throw the responsibility where it belongs.

The names of early warrantees of land and all assessment-lists we have printed as in the original, and also the early township officers. The orthography is varied, it is true, but we did not feel authorized to correct any, since even to-day members of the same family write their names differently.

In the records of the war for the Union we have faithfully endeavored to preserve all coming within our province, and hence have received the aid of a number of soldiers of that war. There were instances where companies or parts of companies were raised or drafted within the counties, but officered by men from other localities; we have failed to distinguish them. While many of the survivors are yet living, it would be well if the different posts of the Grand Army of the Republic would take immediate steps to preserve in permanent form records of all commands or portions of commands or individuals from the counties of Dauphin and Lebanon. They cannot better keep green the memory of their departed and valiant comrades.

As previously stated, we have endeavored to prove faithful to the trust reposed in us. If others can be more so, they have the opportunity. We have been candid in our opinions, in our views of men and measures, and what we have said, have abundant authority therefor. Not desiring to appear in the rôle of an historical iconoclast, we have been compelled to give facts even though they may have toppled over tradition and current history. We have not forced any opinion of our own without good and conclusive evidence.

Had it not been for the great energy of the publishers of this volume, it is doubtful if so comprehensive a work would ever have seen the light of day. They have fulfilled their part of the agreement made with the public, and we regret that their encouragement and success was not commensurate with that spirit of enterprise they have exhibited throughout the undertaking.

Our thanks are due to many kind and appreciative friends who gave us every assistance in their power. To one especially must we make due acknowledgments—our friend and co-laborer A. Boyd Hamilton,—frequently making use of his information as if it was our own.

WILLIAM H. EGLE.

GENERAL HISTORY.

CHAPTER I.

The Aborigines—Susquehannas—Shawanes—Customs and Character—Stone Implements—William Penn's Account of the Indians—Geographical Names.

WE wish it was possible to give an accurate and lucid account of the first inhabitants of this locality. Unfortunately much—very much—of the history of the aborigines is made up from the details of unreliable parties, and yet among the meagre data thus given, some few facts are gleaned which leave us not wholly in the dark. Tradition is the main source of supply, and we all know how little of that can be depended upon for verity. Fortunately the members of the Society of Jesus, the banner of the cross in their hands, during the seventeenth century, preserved not only a record of their own labors in the cause of their divine Master, but somewhat concerning the history of a race for whose spiritual salvation they braved death itself. From their Relations we glean a few facts important to us as to the earliest of the aborigines who lorded it over this section we now claim as our domain.

Prior to 1600, but how long before is not known, the Susquehannas were seated upon the river of that name. By the Relations we find that they had previously come into collision with the Mohawks, then the most eastern of the Iroquois, by which in a war that lasted for ten years the former nearly exterminated their enemy. According to Capt. John Smith, who explored the Chesapeake and its tributaries, the Susquehannas were then, in 1608, still at war with the tribe referred to. In 1633 they were at war with the Algonquin tribes on the Delaware, maintaining their supremacy by butchery. They were friendly to the Dutch, and when the Swedes arrived on the Delaware, in 1638, they renewed the friendly intercourse begun by the former. According to Hazard, they purchased lands of the ruling tribe, and thus secured their friendship. Southward, also, they carried the terror of their arms, and from 1634 to 1644 they waged war on the Yaomacoes, the Piscataways, and Patuxents, and were so troublesome that in 1642 Governor Calvert, by proclamation, declared them public enemies.

When the Hurons, in Upper Canada, in 1647, began to sink under the fearful blows dealt by the Five Nations, the Susquehannas sent an embassy to offer them aid against the common enemy. Nor was the offer one of little value, for the Susquehannas could put into the field one thousand three hundred warriors, trained to the use of fire-arms and European modes of war by three Swedish soldiers, whom they had obtained to instruct them. Before interposing, however, they began a negotiation, and sent an embassy to Onondaga to urge the cantons to peace. The Iroquois refused, and the Hurons, sunk in apathy, took no active steps to secure the aid of the friendly Susquehannas. That tribe, however, maintained its friendly intercourse with its European neighbors, and in 1652, Sawahegeh, and other sachems, in presence of a Swedish deputy, ceded to Maryland all the territory from the Patuxent River to Palmer's Island, and from the Choptauk to the northeast branch north of Elk River.

Four years later, the Iroquois, grown insolent by their success in almost annihilating their kindred tribes north and south of Lake Erie, provoked a war with the Susquehannas, plundering their hunters on Lake Ontario. During that year the smallpox, that terrible scourge of the aborigines, broke out in their town, sweeping off many, and seriously enfeebling the nation. War had now begun in earnest with the Five Nations, and though the Susquehannas had some of their people killed near their town, they in turn pressed the Cayugas so hard that some of them retreated across Lake Ontario to Canada. They also kept the Senecas in such alarm that they no longer ventured to carry their peltries to New York, except in caravans escorted by six hundred men, who even took a most circuitous route. A law of Maryland, passed May 1, 1661, authorized the Governor of that province to aid the Susquehannas.—Egle's History of Pennsylvania.

Smarting under constant defeat, the Five Nations solicited French aid, but in April, 1663, the Western cantons raised an army of eight hundred men to invest and storm the fort of the Susquehannas. This fort was located about fifty miles from the mouth of the river. The enemy embarked on Lake Ontario, according to the French account, and then went overland to the Susquehanna. On reaching the fort, however, they found it well defended on the river side, and on the land side with two bastions in European style, with cannon mounted and connected by a double curtain of large trees. After some trifling skirmishes the Iroquois had recourse to stratagem.

They sent in a party of twenty-five men to treat of peace, and ask provisions to enable them to return. The Susquehannas admitted them, but immediately burned them all alive before the eyes of their countrymen. The force of the Iroquois consisted of one thousand six hundred warriors, while that of the Susquehannas only one hundred. On the retreat of the Iroquois, the Susquehannas pursued them with considerable slaughter.

After this the war was carried on in small parties, and Susquehanna prisoners were from time to time burned at Oneida, Onondaga, Seneca, and Cayuga. In the fall of 1669, the Susquehannas, after defeating the Cayugas, offered peace, but the Cayugas put their ambassador and his nephew to death, after retaining him five or six months,—the Oneidas having taken nine Susquehannas, and sent some to Cayuga, with forty wampum belts to maintain the war.

At this time the great war chief of the Susquehannas was one styled Hochitagete, or Barefoot, and raving women and crafty medicine men deluded the Iroquois with promises of his capture and execution at the stake, and a famous medicine man of Oneida appeared after death to order his body to be taken up and interred on the trail leading to the Susquehannas, as the only means of saving that canton from ruin. Towards the summer of 1672 a body of forty Cayugas descended the Susquehanna in canoes, and twenty Senecas went by land to attack the enemy in their fields; but a band of sixty Andasté, or Susquehanna boys, the oldest not over sixteen, attacked the Senecas and routed them, killing one brave and taking another. Flushed with victory, they pushed on to attack the Cayugas, and defeated them also, killing eight, and wounding with arrow, knife, and hatchet fifteen or sixteen more, losing, however, fifteen or sixteen of their gallant band. At this time the Susquehannas were so reduced by war and pestilence that they could muster only three hundred warriors.

In 1675, according to the Relations Inédites and Colden, the tribe was completely overthrown, but unfortunately we have no details whatever as to the forces which effected it or the time or manner of their utter defeat. The remnant, too proud to yield to those with whom they had long contended as equals, and by holding the land of their fathers by sufferance to acknowledge themselves subdued, yet too weak to withstand the victorious Iroquois, forsook the river bearing their name, taking up a position on the western borders of Maryland, near the Piscataways. Shortly after they were accused of the murder of some settlers, apparently slain by the Senecas. They sent five of their chiefs to the Maryland and Virginia troops, under Col. John Washington, great-grandfather of Gen. George Washington, and Maj. Thomas Truman, who went out in pursuit. Although coming as deputies, and showing the Baltimore medal and certificate of friendship, these chiefs were cruelly put to death. The enraged Susquehannas then began a terrible border war, which was kept up until their utter destruction.

When the founder of Pennsylvania came to this country there was not one of the Susquehannas dwelling in their ancient seat; all had disappeared. Some few vagabond families of the Iroquois remained, occupying the deserted towns of their conquered and expelled enemies. These were the individuals representing themselves as Conestogas,—not by blood, but simply by occupation, a fact to which we shall again refer. They were Cayugas and Senecas.

Whether by persuasion we know not, but certainly by permission of the Iroquois came the Shawanese to Pennsylvania. Their origin was Southern. They probably belonged to the Algonquins, as they spoke the same language. From the most authentic information it appears that the basin of the Cumberland River was the residence of the Shawanese before the settlement of the Europeans on the continent, and that they connected the different sections of the Algonquin families.

At the treaty of 1683 the Shawanese were a party to that covenant, and they must have been considered a very prominent band from the fact of their having preserved the treaty in their own possession or keeping, as we are informed that at a conference held many years after, that nation produced this treaty on parchment to the Governor of the Province. It was the custom with the Indian tribes who made a joint treaty with the whites to commit the preservation of the papers containing the treaty, etc., to such of the bands as were considered most to be trusted. From the best authority, it appears that as early as 1673 upwards of seventy families of that nation removed from the Carolinas and occupied some of the deserted posts of the Susquehanna. Others of the tribe soon followed.

In the year 1698, some Shawanese applied to the proprietary government of Pennsylvania for permission to settle on the Conestoga and Pequea Creeks, under Opossah, their principal chief. Here they remained a quarter of a century, when, with other families settled on the Swatara, Paxtang, and the Susquehanna streams on the east, they branched off to the westward. As early as 1728 we find the Shawanese as far west as the Ohio, and by the middle of the eighteenth century the entire tribe had settled on the branches of that river. In the year 1732 the number of fighting braves of that nation in Pennsylvania amounted to seven hundred. The Shawanese, says Colden, were the most restless of all the Indian tribes. In 1745, he says, one tribe of them had gone to New Spain. This band of four hundred and fifty, who located themselves on the head-waters of the Mobile River, probably never returned to Pennsylvania.

The latter were merely residents on the Susquehanna by sufferance, not only of the whites, but the Five Nations of New York, and yet they became the most perfidious, and to them—their savage brutality, their fiendish atrocity—are we indebted for most all the bloody transactions of a later period.

In complexion, our uncivilized predecessors were of tawny color, inclining to red, which, differing from the complexion of every other portion of the human family, seems peculiar to most, if not all, the aborigines. Their cheek-bones were high and prominent; their eyes widely separated; their noses usually broad, even when curved in outline; and the ordinary cast of their features was coarse and often inexpressive. The men were generally tall, straight, well-proportioned, and hardly ever corpulent or in any manner deformed. The women were too apt to be short and clumsy; their features were seldom delicate or handsome; and what feminine graces they had were soon obliterated by hard bodily labor combined with mental and moral degradation. The beautiful Indian maiden was only a myth or the dream of the poet. The mode of life of the men, and perchance their natural constitution, gave them a power of enduring fatigue and privation such as no European could rival. When necessary they would hunt for days together while suffering from hunger, or perform long journeys through the forests with no other refreshment than a little parched corn and water.

For subsistence, the Indian depended much less upon agriculture than upon either fishing or hunting. They confined themselves chiefly to the raising of beans, corn, and tobacco. The corn and beans were cultivated by women and children, the tobacco alone was thought worthy of the labor and attention of the men. The women of an ordinary family would commonly raise in a single season two or three heaps of corn, each containing twelve, fifteen, or twenty bushels. The corn was spread day after day in the sun, carefully shielded from the rain or dew, and when in this way sufficiently prepared was buried in the earth, and thus preserved for the winter's subsistence.

Hunting and fishing were perchance the chief dependence for food. The forests were filled with animals, some of them beasts of prey, others suitable for food, others valuable on account of their furs. Flocks of wild turkeys roamed through the woods, partridges and pheasants abounded, both in the woods and open country, and at certain times of the year the pigeons collected in such numbers that their flight seemed to obscure the light of the sun. The ponds, creeks, and rivers swarmed with water-fowl. The river Susquehanna was alive with fish, and every spring great numbers of shad, rock-fish, salmon, and perch ascended the stream, furnishing a seasonable supply to the natives when their provisions were exhausted by a long and severe winter.

The clothing of the natives was composed of skins cured so as to be soft and pliable, and sometimes ornamented with paint and beads manufactured from shells. It may be stated in this connection that very little is known of the process used by the Indians to prepare bear- and deer-skins for shoes and clothing. Loskiel says, "Their shoes are of deer-skin, without heels, some being very neatly made by the women. Their skins are tanned with the brains of deer, which make them very soft; some leave the fur upon the skin, and such fur shoes are remarkably light and easy." The buffalo robes sold by our furriers as tanned by the Indians are softer than those that are tanned by civilized people. Occasionally the women decked themselves in mantles made of feathers overlapping each other, as on the back of the fowl, and presenting an appearance of fantastic gayety which no doubt prodigiously delighted the wearers. Their dress consisted usually of two articles, a leather shirt, or under-garment, ornamented with fringe, and a skirt of the same material fastened around the waist with a belt and reaching nearly to the feet. Their hair they dressed in a thick, heavy plait, which fell down upon the neck; and they sometimes ornamented their heads with bands of wampum or with a small cap.

The men went bareheaded, with their hair fantastically trimmed each according to his own fancy. One warrior would have it shaved on one side of the head and long on the other. Another might be seen with his scalp completely bare, except a strip two or three inches in width running from the forehead over to the nape of the neck. This was kept short, and so thoroughly stiffened with paint and bear's grease as to stand up straight, after the fashion of a cock's comb or the crest of a warrior's helmet. The legs were covered with leggins of dressed deer-skin, and the lower part of the body was protected by the breech-cloth, usually called by the early settlers Indian breeches. Moccasins, that is, light shoes of soft-dressed leather, were common to both sexes, and, like other portions of the attire, were many times tastefully ornamented with embroidery of wampum. The men often dispensed with their leggins, especially in summer; while in winter they protected themselves against the bleak air by adding to their garments a mantle of skins. The male children ran about until they were ten or twelve years old in a state of nature; the girls were provided with an apron, although of very economical dimensions.

As to their houses and furniture, their food and its preparation, amusements, courtship and marriage, we shall not refer. There are certain peculiarities characteristic of the Indian which are interesting to dwell upon, but these must be left to another occasion. A few remarks, however, upon their moral life may explain their future conduct towards the white settlers. The Indian of to-day, however, is a fair type of those savages who lived in our locality two centuries ago. We dislike to picture vice in all its horrid details, and so much that is inherent in the savage nature of the aborigine we shall refrain from referring.

Although marriage was not always recognized among their rites, unfaithfulness was looked upon as a crime, and even death was frequently inflicted for this offense by the irate husband. Licentiousness was common, and the man who looked upon the waywardness of his wife, visiting her with blows and wounds, may have been the most debauched creature in the tribe. No female ever ventured alone, for bestiality was the besetting sin of the race. Uncleanliness was in all their manners. Impatient of bodily labor, and indisposed to thought, they naturally turned for pleasure to those coarse gratifications of the senses which were within reach. They were indolent when not strongly incited to exertion; they were gluttonous when supplied with an abundance of food, and they became intemperate as soon as the means of intemperance were placed within their reach. They were revengeful by nature; custom had made vengeance with them a matter of duty and honor. They had little idea of truth; they were natural-born liars, and as a result were the meanest of robbers. As for murder and arson they had no compunctions of conscience; there were no refined feelings in their nature. Selfish in the extreme, they never realized what was ennobling. Their virtues, if they had any, were lost in the multitude of vices. Their ideas of religion were crude and indefinite. With the advent of the pious Moravian and faithful Jesuit, new conceptions of a divinity crept into their obtuse minds, but it is doubtful if they ever had or held the doctrines imparted to them of a Great Spirit, and the existence of the soul after death. Their sordid and supremely selfish natures could not raise their thoughts so high, for had such been the case there would be some redeeming qualities in the moral life of the Indian.

We shall close our account of the aborigines with such reference to the weapons of war and domestic implements employed by them as may be of value and interest. No field presents to the ethnologist a greater variety of material than that of the Susquehanna, and the illustrations herewith given and described were all found within the present limits of the county of Dauphin. The abundance of these relics of the Stone Age scattered upon the shores of the rivers, its islands, and for many miles inward, show unmistakable evidences of this section of country being in possession for many centuries of a powerful nation.

The number of stone implements were far larger than many persons would suppose. Prior to the coming of the white man, with the exception of pottery and pipes, both made of clay, and wooden bowls made of the knots of trees, all articles for domestic use, ornament, and for war, were formed of stone. Some are quite ingenious, and with all the improved machinery of the present day, we doubt if as fine specimens of arrowheads could be produced as those in our possession made by Indian arrowhead-makers of the centuries ago.

Hammer stones were possibly the first stone implements.

Arrowheads are the most abundant of all stone implements to be found in this section. Few fields there are whose upturned sod does not reveal arrowheads either entire or fragmentary, and especially along the bottoms of the creeks are these specimens of the Indian arrow-maker to be found. They vary in size from one-half an inch to four inches in length, composed of quartz, flint, limestone, chalcedony, and other hard yet fragile minerals. Few are perfectly formed, being varied to suit ideas of the makers as to their form and shape. With the exception of two or three points on the first range of the Kittatinny Mountains, and among the boulders along the Cone-wago, we have not been able to discover the workshop of the arrow-maker. Limestone is abundant in the county, and jutted out everywhere, while the pebbles of the Susquehanna furnished red and yellow jasper, which seem to have been selected as much for their beauty as for their utility. The art of arrow-making had been reduced to a perfect system, and were shaped in accordance with the taste and fancy of the maker. As Professor Brunner aptly says, "It was as easy for them to chip a large arrowhead down to a small one without breaking it as it is for a Caucasian to whittle a stick down to a tooth-pick." As to their manufacture, the authority just quoted says, "The first step was to select a solid stone of uniform density, and by trial discover which way the stone chips. Flints do not chip equally well in all directions. The second step is flaking or breaking large chips off a rock." The stone celt for chisel and hammer, it is true, bore a conspicuous part in the instruments used in forming the larger implements of war, agriculture, and those employed in the preparation of food, namely, mortars and pestles, and to a certain extent in shaping the arrowhead and articles above mentioned. Yet, says a good authority,¹ in the examination of a collection of hundreds of chips and flakes, there was not found the first one bearing the marks of the celt upon the face or edge, showing that the application of instruments of bone and wood, combined with friction, were the means by which they were dressed into shape. This method has been experimented upon very successfully by Professor Brunner with a block of chalcedony and a hard, dry piece of hickory. "For the large and even middle-sized chipped implements the Indians must have tied a bone on a heavy stick and used it as a lever, otherwise it is difficult to conceive how they could have obtained a sufficient amount of pressure—direct physical force would have been inadequate."

To undertake to describe a collection of these points is not in our province, nor would it repay the reader. As previously stated, they were made of different designs, such as the fancy of the arrowhead-maker suggested. The heads were attached to the end of reed shafts or split hickory, about two feet in length, by means of a cord, and sprung from a bow in such a manner that made them a most formidable instrument of warfare. They were used in the chase, and so expert were the aborigines that it was rarely they missed their object. The arrowheads of larger size were attached to sticks and used for spearing fish. Loskiel says, "Little boys are even frequently seen wading in shallow brooks, shooting small fishes with their bows and arrows."

Knives includes diverse forms, some of which become allied to the arrowheads produced by chipping, and thus used as a saving of labor and material. Upon a close comparison these may be readily distinguished from the arrowheads, the former being beveled on one side to form a sharp-cutting edge and point, while the latter, unfinished, is full in the centre and beveled both ways, both being flat on the lower side. The leaf-shaped knife presents the finest appearance, vary little in thickness, and are from two to five and six inches in length. Those found in this section are made of limestone or slate, although quartzite and jasper are not uncommon. There is a much larger class found along the banks of the Susquehanna and Swatara and adjoining fields which resemble in shape those just alluded to, and may be properly called bark-knives, and used no doubt in barking trees and making canoes, as a large percentage of canoes were made of that material. They were also employed in "digging out" the knots used for bowls and buckets. It may also be stated that some of the knives were stemmed and fastened to a handle. They were frequently used for "sticking beasts" or stabbing.

Line-Sinkers, or Penlants, are abundant on the islands in the Susquehanna, notably at the head of Conewago Falls, at Duncan's Island, mouth of the Juniata, or farther up, at Clemson's Island, noted fishing-grounds, until the past fifty years. Some of the sinkers are made square, with rounded corners, well polished, having light notches on two edges in which to attach the cord. They are usually from one to three or four inches square, by one-fourth to five-eighths of an inch thick, composed principally of limestone and slate, and others with deeper grooves in the common river pebble. The latter stone, with fragments of pot-stone vessels used for the same purpose, are generally perforated either in the end or side. These sinkers were used in connection with long lines, to which the hooks were attached by shorter ones on the same principle of our present manner of out-line fishing, by being attached certain distances apart, and cast from the shore with heavier sinkers or anchor-stone at the outer end of the line, the whole being drawn back at certain intervals by the angler. That their fish-hooks were made of bone we have no doubt, and in a collection of implements gathered and sent to England thirty years ago were two rude fish-hooks made of the bone of some animal.

Borers or drills are generally lanceolate and very delicate, and it is surprising so many are found in so perfect a condition. The material of which they are made is usually limestone. It is astonishing with what neatness and accuracy these small and delicately-made perforators do the work, even in the hardest kind of stone. That they, too, were used by experienced workers of stone, there is no doubt, as we have many instances where the slightest carelessness on the part of the mechanic would have spoiled the design, especially where they appear in scepters, as some of them present but an eighth of an inch of stone between the hole and the face of implements, which is one reason, no doubt, so many are found broken in use. The borers were fastened to a stick like arrowheads and whirled around with the hand, or a bow and string. The perforating no doubt completed the specimen, no matter to what class it belonged, as there are specimens of every class of implements to be found in this section perfect in every respect except to the perforated part. These also appear in different stages of completion, from a slight depression made by the point of the borer to a distance almost completing the work.

Of all the implements none are equal in beauty of design and workmanship to the stone scepter, or drilled ceremonial implement, which are seldom found whole; half scepters are frequently found. These are invariably broken through the eye, or perforated part of the stone, done most likely in use, as they are as a general thing delicately made. One of the finest we have seen is ovoid in shape, and truncate at base and top. The sides are beveled to form a very accurate edge; the groove is through the long diameter of the implement, and shows concentric slight grooves made by the boring implement. One of the raised edges which runs parallel with the groove is acute, the other truncate. The greatest length of this implement is four inches, and its greatest breadth three and a half inches; diameter of groove five-eighths of an inch. The material has not been determined.

It was customary among all aboriginal tribes to record the most memorable events by notches in wood or stone, designating the importance of it by the size of the notch, thus the record of victory by one deeper and more durable than those recording time and the less important events. These calendars are frequently met with, and often appear upon ornaments of bone, wood, and stone, of which we have several in our collection.

Their axes were generally made of a hard rock, such as diabase, sandstone, etc., by taking any fragment of rock obtained by striking one rock upon another, when after trimming it down to a desirable shape, ground down all the irregularities by some process of abrasion. This they could have done by rubbing the stone to be polished on a sandstone, or by using sand as abrasive material upon any hard stone. When it is considered how slow a process this must have been, some idea may be formed of the unbounded patience it must have required to grind the unbounded axes into shape.

The question is often asked, says Professor Brunner, with a great deal of emphasis, how did the Indians cut wood with these axes? The Indian could not use his stone axe for the same purpose for which we use the steel axe. Loskiel says, "Their hatchets [or axes] were wedges made of hard stone, six or eight inches long, sharpened at the edge and fastened to a wooden handle. They were not used to fell trees, but only to peel them or to kill their enemies." The next question that arises is how did they fell their trees? Loskiel answers again, "Formerly, when they had no axes but those made of stone as above mentioned, they used to kindle a fire around large trees and burn them so long till they fell; then by applying fire to different parts of the stem and branches, they divided them into smaller pieces for use." "Formerly they kindled a fire by turning or twisting a dry stick with great swiftness upon a dry board, using both hands." They kept their fires constantly burning in their wigwams. It is difficult to imagine how happy the Indians must have been when they first obtained axes from the traders or settlers, with which they were enabled to manipulate their wood and erect their wigwams more expeditiously and satisfactorily. The axes were used also to girdle the trees and take off the bark which they used to cover their huts. In making their canoes they would cover the sides of the log with ground or other material which was constantly kept wet, and would burn out the middle. The axes are supposed to have been employed to remove the charcoal in this operation. These are the purposes for which it is generally conceded that the stone axes were adapted, but the variety of their implements was comparatively small, and they might have used their axes for various other objects. The size of the axes varied. The one from which our illustration was made is nearly eleven inches in length by three and a half inches in width, while others scarcely one-third the length have been preserved.

The pestle was used in the grinding of corn, and are of varied lengths, the original of the one shown being about eighteen inches in length, formed of hard, uncrystallized rock, perfectly smooth and cylindrical, each end nicely tapering. Implements of this character were not used especially for pounding in a mortar, but for rubbing soaked or green corn on a flat stone into a pulp, which was then moulded and baked in the ashes. Other pestles there were which were used for pounding, the blunt ends denoting this.

The tomahawk of the aborigine was simply a small-sized axe finely polished, to which a handle was firmly tied, and carried by its owner in his belt. That implement, which we associate with the atrocity of the red man, was not a stone instrument but one of iron, secured from the trader or early settler in exchange for skins. In this connection we must refer to the hatchets found in many localities frequented by the savages and known in the Indian trade as "Biscay Axes." They were of several sizes, the largest about eight inches long by three inches across the face, weighed about three pounds; the smaller, about six inches long by three inches across the face, weighed one and a half pounds. The largest size was the squaw axe, used in gathering firewood, the smaller was the tomahawk of the warrior, and carried habitually when traveling or when on the war-path. In battle they were used at close quarters, and surprising stories are told of the accuracy with which they could be thrown at distances of several yards. In certain localities where Indian towns have been destroyed by fire great numbers are found. So plenty were they when the country was new, that the pioneers who were fortunate enough to have a town site of this character on their farms had iron sufficient to shoe their oxen and horses and to supply other necessary wants for several years. As late as 1879 there were found no less than six in one farm scrap heap on the site of a Shawanese town along the Susquehanna. They are generally of the model shown in our engraving, and almost invariably have the three cross trade-marks on each side. Specimens of these there is good reason for believing have been buried two hundred years, somewhat corroded, but just as serviceable as when new. Many have not a particle of steel, and never had; others are well steeled and finely tempered. So far as we are able to judge there was no difference in model or finish, whether furnished by the Dutch, English, or French traders. Henry Fleet, an English trader on the Potomac in 1632, met some Indians from the direction of Lake Erie, called HERCHKEENES. He says, "There came from another place seven lusty men with strange attire; they had red fringe, and two of them had beaver coats, which they gave me. Their language was haughty, and they seemed to ask me what I did there, and demanded to see my truck, which upon view they scorned. They had two axes such as Capt. Kirk traded in Cannida, which he bought at Whits of Wapping, and there I bought mine, and think I had as good as he."

Within the brief compass of a local history it is impossible to allude at length to all the implements used by the natives. They had mortars, barking tools, polishing-stones, scalping-knives, digging tools without numbers, and relics have been discovered the use of which is unknown. Bowls, pots, and kettles were as essential in the Indian household as in that of the white man. Before they purchased these from the traders or took them in payment for land they were obliged to make them in their own peculiar way. All crockery is fragile, and for this reason only small pieces of Indian earthenware can be found. The most notable collection is that in possession of the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society at Wilkes-Barré, and concerning which Dr. Harrison Wright has recently given a description. We have had pieces sufficient, if properly placed together at the time, to make a large pot holding two quarts of water. Portions of vessels made of soapstone are to be found, but we have never discovered or known of one entire to be found in this region.

The Indians had their games, the principal of which was quoits, and we give an illustration of one secured on Duncan's Island. At one time these were quite numerous, but no notice being taken of them they seem to have disappeared altogether. They are circular or of disc shape, with a cavity on the upper side for the thumb, the lower side round, and thus well fitted to the hand for throwing.

Rock carvings, although to be found, are not numerous. On the western shore of the Susquehanna, opposite the city of Harrisburg, one-fourth of a mile below the Cumberland Valley Railroad bridge, there was, prior to the construction of the Northern Central railway, a cave opening to the river, on the walls of which we saw quite a number of rude figures, somewhat like those on the sculptured rock in the Susquehanna near Safe Harbor. It is to be regretted that some archæologist had not discovered them ere the age of improvement completely obliterated the spot, and preserved to us a record thereof.

About 1850, George Zimmerman, of Middletown, found in a bed of gravel on the east bank of the Susquehanna, below the mouth of Swatara Creek, a fine specimen of Indian carving. The material is brown slate, and represents a portion of the head and face of an Indian; size, seven-eighths of an inch in diameter and half an inch thick at the ears, from which it tapers to the forehead and chin, somewhat in the shape of a half-moon, having high cheek bone resemblance, with deep-set eyes and Roman nose; in every particular a faithful type of the Indian countenance. It is the work of a skillful artist, and in perfect state of preservation.

One of the most interesting characteristics and study of the aborigines is that of ornamentation. Nothing was more sublime and elevating in the eyes of an aged savage whose lease of usefulness was about to expire than the sight of their warriors equipped and painted. This habit was indulged in in various ways by ornaments of stone, bone, shells, wood, feathers, and beads for the festivities of camp life, while no warrior was known to enter upon the chase, the war-path, or any important council of the tribe of which he was a member without first undergoing a process of ornamentation, in which the "war-paint" was applied to face, breast, and arms in such manner as to give them the most hideous appearance, red predominating, which usually consisted of a mineral substance resembling ochre, pulverized and mixed with bear's oil in small mortars made for the purpose. The paint thus mixed was kept ready for use in little cup-shaped implements of stone, or in jars of pottery, illustrations of both of which are given.

Ornaments of brown polished stone have been found in numerous places along the Susquehanna. Some of these are cone-shaped, round, flat, and oval, all pierced with holes, showing conclusively to us that they were worn around the neck on strings. One shown in our engraving, found at the mouth of Clark's Creek, is of peculiar shape, and worn by married women as evidence of fecundity. Slabs of stones or tablets, varying from two to three inches in width by four to six inches in length, and one-fourth inch in thickness, were also used. Some of these have ground edges, while others are scalloped. Upon them are curious designs consisting of straight and cross lines, oblique, round, and lines of triangular form. The representation of a saltier is not uncommon, as also on their pottery, which, we are satisfied, was simply an accidental resemblance, although it must be confessed that designs somewhat heraldic descended from one chief to another, an insignia not of royalty, but of family renown and valor, and why not?

William Penn, in his letter to the Free Society of Traders in London, dated at "Philadelphia, the 16th of the 6th month, called August, 1683," thus refers to the natives. His estimate of their moral character in some respects differs widely from our own. His was made from a brief acquaintance of a few months, our own deduced from the general record of the race covering the intervening period since his day :

"The notices I shall consider in their persons, language, manners, religion, and government, with my sense of their original. For their persons, they are generally tall, straight, well-built, and of singular proportion ; they tread strong and clever, and mostly walk with a lofty chin. Of complexion, black, but by design, as the Gypsies in England. They grease themselves with bear's fat clarified, and using no defence against sun or weather, their skin must needs be swarthy. Their eye is little and black, not unlike a straight-looking Jew. The thick lip and flat nose, so frequent with the East Indians and blacks, are not common to them, for I have seen as comely European-like faces among them, of both, as on your side the sea; and truly an Italian complexion hath not much more of the white, and the noses of several of them have as much of the Roman.

"Their language is lofty, yet narrow ; but, like the Hebrew, in signification full ; like short-hand, in writing, one word serveth in the place of three, and the rest are supplied by the understanding of the hearer ; imperfect in their tenses, wanting in their moods, participles, adverbs, conjunctions, interjections. I have made it my business to understand it, that I might not want an interpreter on any occasion, and I must say that I know not a language spoken in Europe that hath words of more sweetness, or greatness in accent and emphasis than theirs ; for instance, Ootocoon, Rancecas, Oriston, Shuk, Marian, Pognessis ; all which are names of places, and have grader in them. Of words of sweetness, Ama, is mother ; Issimus, a brother ; Netap, friend ; Uaque-rot, very good ; Pane, bread ; Metsa, eat ; Matta, no ; Hatta, to have ; Poyo, to come ; Spassin, Passijou, the names of places ; Tamaue, Seome, Meuane, Scatwrens, are the names of persons ; if one asks them for anything they have not, they will answer, Matta ne hatta ; which to translate is, not I have, instead of I have not.

"Of their customs and manners there is much to be said ; I will begin with children ; so soon as they are born they wash them in water ; and while very young, and in cold weather to chuse, they plunge them in the rivers to harden and embolden them. Having wrapt them in a cloth, they lay them on a straight, thin board, a little more than the length and breadth of the child, and swaddle it fast upon the board to make it straight ; wherefore all Indians have flat heads ; and thus they carry them at their backs. The children will go, very young, at nine months commonly ; they wear only a small cloth round their waist till they are big ; if boys, they go a fishing, till ripe for the woods ; which is about fifteen ; then they hunt ; and after having given some proofs of their manhood by a good return of skins, they may marry ; else it is a shame to think of a wife. The girls stay with their mothers, and help to hoe the ground, plant corn and carry burdens ; and they do well to use them to that young, which they must do when they are old ; for the wives are the true servants of the husbands ; otherwise the men are very affectionate to them.

"When the young women are fit for marriage, they wear something upon their heads, for an advertisement, but so, as their faces are hardly to be seen, but when they please. The age, they marry at, if women, is about thirteen, and fourteen ; if men, seventeen and eighteen ; they are rarely elder.

"Their houses are mats, or barks of trees, set on poles, in the fashion of an English barn, but out of the power of the winds ; for they are hardly higher than a man ; they lie on reeds, or grass. In travel they lodge in the woods, about a great fire, with the mantle of undress they wear by day wrapt about them, and a few boughs stuck around them.

"Their diet is maize, or Indian corn, divers ways prepared : sometimes roasted in the ashes ; sometimes beaten and boiled with water ; which they call houine ; they also make cakes, not unpleasant to eat. They have likewise several sorts of beans and pease, that are good nourishment ; and the woods and rivers are their larder.

"If an European comes to see them, or calls for lodging at their house, or wigwam, they give him the best place and first cut. If they come to visit us, they salute us with an Auk ; which is as much as to say, Good be to you, and set them down ; which is mostly on the ground, close to their heels, their legs upright ; it may be they speak not a word, but observe all passages. If you give them anything to eat, or drink, well, for they will not ask ; and be it little or much, if it be with kindness, they are well pleased, else they go away sullen, but say nothing.

"They are great concealers of their own resentments ; brought to it,

I believe, by the revenge that hath been practised among them. In either of these they are not exceeded by the Italians. A tragical instance fell out since I came into the country : a king's daughter, thinking herself slighted by her husband, in suffering another woman to lie down between them, rose up, went out, plucked a root out of the ground and ate it ; upon which she immediately died ; and, for which, last week, he made an offering to her kindred, for atonement, and liberty of marriage ; as two others did to the kindred of their wives that died a natural death. For, till widowers have done so, they must not marry again. Some of the young women are said to take undue liberty before marriage, for a portion ; but when married, chaste. When with child they know their husbands no more, till delivered ; and during their month they touch no meat they eat but with a stick, lest they should defile it ; nor do their husbands frequent them till that time be expired.

"But in liberality they excel ; nothing is too good for their friend ; give them a fine gun, coat, or other thing, it may pass twenty hands before it sticks : light of heart, strong affections, but soon spent. The most merry creatures that live, feast and dance perpetually ; they never have much, nor want much ; wealth circulateh like the blood : all parts partake ; and though none shall want what another hath, yet exact observers of property. Some kings have sold, others presented me with several parcels of land ; the pay or presents I made them were not hoarded by the particular owners ; but the neighboring kings and their clans being present when the goods were brought out, the parties chiefly concerned consulted what, and to whom, they should give them. To every king then, by the hands of a person for that work appointed, is a proportion sent, so sorted and folded, and with that gravity that is admirable. Then that king subdivideth it in like manner among his dependants, they hardly leaving themselves an equal share with one of their subjects, and be it on such occasions as festivals, or at their common meals, the kings distribute, and to themselves last. They care for little, because they want but little ; and the reason is, a little contents them. In this they are sufficiently revenged on us ; if they are ignorant of our pleasures, they are also free from our pains. They are not disquieted with bills of lading and exchange, nor perplexed with chancery suits and exchequer reckonings. We sweat and toil to live ; their pleasure feeds them ; I mean their hunting, fishing, and fowling, and this table is spread everywhere. They eat twice a day, morning and evening ; their seats and table are the ground. Since the Europeans came into these parts they have grown great lovers of strong liquors, rum especially ; and for it exchange the richest of their skins and furs. If they are heated with liquors, they are restless till they have enough to sleep ; that is their cry, Some more and I will go to sleep ; but, when drunk, one of the most wretched spectacles in the world !

"In sickness, impatient to be cured, and for it give anything, especially for their children, to whom they are extremely natural. They drink at those times a feru, or decoction of some roots in spring water ; and if they eat any flesh, it must be of the female of any creature. If they die, they bury them with their apparel, be they man or woman, and the nearest of kin sing in something precious with them, as a token of their love. Their mourning is blacking of their faces, which they continue for a year. They are choice of the graves of their dead ; for, lest they should be lost by time, and fall to common use, they pick off the grass that grows upon them, and heap up the fallen earth with great care and exactness.

"These poor people are under a dark night in things relating to religion ; to be sure the tradition of it : yet they believe a God and immortality, without the help of metaphysics : for, they say, There is a Great King that made them, who dwells in a glorious country to the southward of them ; and that the souls of the good shall go thither, where they shall live again. Their worship consists of two parts, sacrifice and cantica. Their sacrifice is their first fruits ; the first and fattest buck they kill goeth to the fire, where he is all burnt, with a mournful duty of him that performeth the ceremony ; but with such marvellous fervency and labor of body, that he will even sweat to a foam. The other part is their cantica, performed by round dances, sometimes words, sometimes songs, then shouts ; two being in the middle that begin ; and, by singing and drumming on a board, direct the chorus. Their postures in the dance are very antick and differing, but all keep measure. This is done with equal earnestness and labor, but great appearance of joy. In the fall, when the corn cometh in, they begin to feast one another. There have been two great festivals already to which all come that will. I was at one myself : their entertainment was a great seat by a spring, under some shady trees, and twenty bucks, with hot cakes of new corn, both wheat and beans, which they make up in a square form, in the leaves of the stem, and bake them in the ashes ; and after that they fall to dance. But they that go must carry a small present in their money ; it may be sixpence ; which is made of the bone of a fish: the black is with them as gold; the white, silver; they call it all wampum.

"Their government is by Kings, which they call Sachama, and those by succession, but always of the mother's side. For instance, the children of him who is now king will not succeed, but his brother by the mother, or the children of his sister, whose sons (and after them the children of her daughters) will reign; for no woman inherits. The reason they render for this way of descent, is, that their issue may not be spurious.

"Every King hath his Council; and that consists of all the old and wise men of his nation; which, perhaps, is two hundred people. Nothing of moment is undertaken, but he it war, peace, selling of land, or traffic, without advising with them: and, which is more, with the young men too. It is admirable to consider how powerful the Kings are, and yet how they move by the breath of their people. I have had occasion to be in council with them, upon treaties for land, and to adjust the terms of trade. The order is thus: The King sits in the middle of an half moon, and hath his council, the old and wise, on each hand; behind them, or at a little distance, sit the younger fry, in the same figure. Having consulted and resolved their business, the King ordered one of them to speak to me; he stood up, came to me, and in the name of his King saluted me; then took me by the hand, and told me, 'He was ordered by his King to speak to me; and that now it was not he, but the King, that spoke; because what he should say was the King's mind.' He first prayed me 'to excuse them, that they had not complied with me the last time, he feared there might be some fault in the Interpreter, being neither Indian nor English;' besides, it was the Indian custom to deliberate, and take up much time in council before they resolve; and that if the young people and owners of the land had been as ready as he, I had not met with so much delay.' Having thus introduced his matter, he fell to the bounds of the land they had agreed to dispose of, and the price; which now is little and dear; that which would have bought twenty miles, but buying now two. During the time that this person spoke, not a man of them was observed to whisper or smile; the old, grave; the young, reverent, in their deportment. They speak little, but fervently, and with elegance. I have never seen more natural sagacity, considering them without the help (I was going to say the spoil) of tradition; and he will deserve the name of wise that outwits them in any treaty, about a thing they understand. When the purchase was agreed, great promises passed between us, 'of kindness and good neighborhood, and that the Indians and English must live in love as long as the sun gave light;' which done, another made a speech to the Indians, in the name of all the Sachamakers, or Kings; first to tell them what was done; next, to charge and command them 'to love the Christians, and particularly live in peace with me, and the people under my government; that many Governors had been in the river; but that no Governor had come himself to live and stay here before; and having now such an one, that had treated them well, they should never do him or his any wrong;'—at every sentence of which they shouted and said Amen, in their way.

"The justice they have is pecuniary: In case of any wrong or evil act, be it murder itself, they atone by feasts, and presents of their wampum; which is proportioned to the quality of the offence, or person injured, or of the sex they are of. For, in case they kill a woman, they pay double; and the reason they render, is, 'that she breedeth children; which men cannot do.' It is rare that they fall out, if sober; and, if drunk, they forgive it, saying, 'It was the drink, and not the man, that abused them.'

"We have agreed that, in all differences between us, each side shall end the matter. Do not abuse them, but let them have justice, and you win them. The worst is, that they are the worse for the Christians; who have propagated their vices, and yielded them tradition for ill, and not for good things. But as low an ebb as these people are at, and as inglorious as their own condition looks, the Christians have not outlived their sight, with all their pretensions to an higher manifestation. What good, then, might not a good people graft where there is so distinct a knowledge left between good and evil? I beseech God to incline the hearts of all that come into these parts to outlive the knowledge of the natives, by a fixed obedience to their greater knowledge of the will of God; for it were miserable, indeed, for us to fall under the just censures of the poor Indian conscience, while we make profession of things so far transcending.

"For their original, I am ready to believe them of the Jewish race; I mean of the stock of the ten tribes; and that, for the following reasons: First, they were to go to a 'land not planted, nor known;' which, to be sure, Asia and Africa were, if not Europe; and he that intended that extraordinary judgment upon them, might make the passage not uneasy to them, as it is not impossible in itself, from the easternmost parts of Asia to the westernmost of America. In the next place; I find them of the like countenance, and their children of so lively resemblance, that a man would think himself in Duke's Place, or Berry Street, in London, when he seeth them. But this is not all; they agree in rites; they reckon by moons; they offer their first fruits; they have a kind of feast of tabernacles; they are said to lay their altar upon twelve stones; their morning a year; customs of women, with many other things that do not now occur."

Within the limits of our county are a number of Indian geographical names, which necessitate some allusion as to their meaning and derivation. All names derived from the language of the natives have undergone many changes in orthography.¹ At first, every one spelled them to suit himself. The English, Irish, German, French, Dutch, and so on, had each their peculiar way of representing the Indian sounds. This gave rise to many variations. The dialectical differences in the Indian tongue greatly increased these variations. The ignorance and carelessness of many men in the proper use of letters in their own language and of the sound in other languages increased these variations still further. Hence we find such a diversity of orthography that sometimes it takes an experienced person to recognize some of the forms.

At length these words, by common usage, have come to a settled orthography. This usage often destroyed or mutilated the original word. This process of Anglicising Indian words generally consulted ease of speech, and seldom correctness of original sounds. Most of them, right or wrong, are now established. A very few still remain unsettled.

One difficulty with Indian names along the Susquehanna River is that the region was inhabited by tribes of both the Huron-Iroquois and Algonquin stocks of Indians; and each of these families had tribes on its banks, whose dialectical variations were so great that they hardly understood each other a word. This was the case with the Shawanese and Delawares, though both Algonquins. One safe rule may be adopted, viz., all names requiring the use of the lips in pronunciation did not originate from any of the tribes of the Huron-Iroquois family.

The regions of the lower Susquehanna having been overrun by so many Indian races and subdivisions of races, we may naturally look for remains of all these diversely speaking tribes in the geographical vestiges that have come down to us. It is this that makes investigation so very difficult. To get at the meaning of a term we must first know the language or Indian nationality to which it belonged. To do this would involve a knowledge of several Indian tongues and many more almost equally difficult dialectical variations.

It is an interesting fact, also, that many of the names given by the incoming tribe were translations into their own tongue of the same names employed by the tribe that preceded them. Many terms used by the Delawares were only translations of Susquehanna or Iroquois terms previously used. Even the English on their advent often translated these names into the corresponding English terms. This is apt to be the case in all such cases as Fishing, Beaver, and Stony Creeks. The historical idea remains, clinging, as with hooks of steel, even when given the new translated sound.

The only one in the old days that did posterity a great service in preserving the meaning of the Indian geographical names was the Moravian missionary, Heckewelder. He lived long among the Delawares, and was quite familiar with their language and the dialect of the sub-tribes. He has given us his opinion on many of these names, and he is in general, of course, good authority; but even he, in some cases, must be received with great caution. He was a great admirer of the Delawares, and had strong prejudices against the Iroquois, which often warped his judgment. In his love for the Delawares he made all the names emanate from them that he possibly could. He made some undoubted Iroquois or Andastick words appear with far-fetched ideas of Delaware origin. We receive his statements with caution when they tend to disparage the Iroquois and extol the Delawares. Notwithstanding this we must acknowledge him as having rendered a most valuable service in rescuing the origin of many words from oblivion.

We come now to notice the word Susquehanna. Our first knowledge of it is from the History of Virginia, by Capt. John Smith, published in London in 1629. He describes his exploration of the Chesapeake Bay, at the head of which he found four rivers. He went up the largest one as far as his barge could pass for rocks. Here he awaited the arrival of some Susquehannoughs, for whom he had sent a couple of interpreters. The interpreters were of the people called Tockwoghs, one interpreted from Powhatten language to Tockwogh and Susquehannough. The chief town was "two days' journey higher than our barge could pass for rocks." They numbered "near six hundred able men, and are palisaded in their towns to defend them from the Massawomes, their mortal enemies." "Three or four days we expected their return, then sixty of those giant-like people came down." Five of the chiefs came aboard and crossed over the bay. Smith took a picture of one of them, the calf of whose leg was twenty-seven inches in circumference. They had five other towns belonging to their nation beside Susquehannough, the second Quadroque, about twenty miles farther up, beyond which there are two branches, on the western one is Utchowig, and on the eastern one Tesinigh. Which branch is the main river cannot be told from the map. By the scale these towns would be about sixty miles from the bay. On a western branch, entering the river below Susquehannough, is Attaock, seemingly sixteen miles from it. Smith drew this map from the representations of the Indians. The scale would place the first town only about twenty-one miles above the mouth of the river. But we know he was not very accurate, for he says he could not go two miles up the river for the falls, yet we know the first rocks at the head of tide are four miles, and the mark on his map of the distance penetrated along the river by the scale is some twelve miles, or more than half the distance from the bay to Susquehannough, to which it took the interpreters two days to travel. It is probable that at this time the chief town was at the Conestoga, Columbia, or even as high as Marietta, that Attaock was about York, Quadroque at Middletown, Tesinigh at Lebanon, and Utchowig about Harrisburg. The sixth town, Cepawig, was on the heads of the Patapsco, probably Westminster, Md.

Capt. Smith did not get the name Susquehannoughs from those Indians themselves. He does not tell us what they called themselves. He got his name for them from a tribe called Tockwoghs who numbered only one hundred men, and were probably of the Nanticoke family. The first part, Sasquesa, meant Falls; the second part, Hannough, is the Algonquin hanne, meaning stream. As applied to these people by their neighbors, it signifies very expressively the people of the Falls River. Through time the word was gradually changed to Susquehannock, and finally to Susquehanna. It is possible that Sasquesa was part of the name by which these people called themselves, and that they appended to it the Mohawk word Haga, for people or nation, as in the case of Onojutta-Haga. At all events Smith and his party well understood its meaning, for they translated it, as appears from the account given by his companion, who says, "The Susquehannock's River we called Smith's Falles." It is an interesting fact, that the Sasquesa is the same word that still lingers in the creek, Siccasarungo, Siccasabungo, Chickasabungo, Chiquesabungo, now contracted into Chickies and Chiques, and applied to the stream entering the river above Columbia and below Marietta, on which there once was an Indian town of that name, and it strongly suggests that this may even have been the very location of Smith's chief town Susquehannough. The latter part of the word still remains in such names as Rappahannock, Loyalhanna, etc.

In the "new map of Virginia and Maryland and improved parts of Pennsylvania," by John Lenex in 1719, revised in 1721, in atlas form, and printed in London, we have on the east side of the Susquehanna, from Maryland up, these towns marked, Canoonawengh (latitude 40° 5'), Unondomerus, Cesko, Ocgwandery, and Skawaghkaha. The latter is no doubt our modern Swatara. The map extends to latitude 40° 30'. The river forks at 40° 25'. The right branch is called Onestega. On the left branch (Juniata?) at 40° 12' is Kahetnoge. These are evidently Iroquois terms. The author says the natives are so much diminated by civil wars that they have not over five hundred men, mostly on the eastern shore and employed by the English to hunt deer. "Atlas Noveam," by Covens & Mortier, Amsterdam (no date), London, 1733, on back, gives No. 69 part of a large Popple, has on the Susquehanna River, from Maryland up, Conestogo, Indian Fort, Sicasarongo, Conewaga, Swahadowri, Ganadaguhet, Enwaga-Aratumquat, Chemegaide, Conahago, Codocoraren, Sionassi, and Seawondaona (Towanda). "De Annville's Amerique Septentrionale" (French atlas), smaller map, 1746, gives from Maryland up, Indian Fort, Skahadowri, Chemegaide, Canahoga, Juragen, Codocoraren, Sionassa, Juragen, Seawondaona.

It is said William Penn made two visits to the Susquehanna River, and was up as far as the Swatara Creek, and contemplated founding a city somewhere on the river. His last visit was in the spring of 1701, and it is believed the towns on the Popple map were all inhabited about this time and later. They differ from those given in the Colonial Records, probably because the French map-makers got their names from the Iroquois, who often gave their own names rather than that of the residents.

The Swahadowri will be recognized as Swatara; Ganadaguhet as Conedoguinot, and Chemegaide, we think, should be Cheniegaide, and means the Juniata. We have found the word spelled Sognejjadie, Chuchniada, Choniata, Chinniotta, Joniady, Scokoonidy, and many other ways. The root of the word is the Iroquois term Onejia or Onia, meaning a stone. The first part, now written with a j, is only a breathing of some of the Iroquois dialects, which the English often designated by letters such as the above, but which the French seldom expressed, as, for example, the French name the Iroquois call the Governor of Canada "Onontio," while the English mostly wrote it "Younondio." The Onojntta-Haga, or Juniata nation, were the people of the Standing Stone. There can be no doubt but that Indian towns were located on Duncan's Island, at the mouth of that river, at the different epochs in Indian history. Rev. David Brainerd visited the "pagans" on "Juneata Island" in September of 1745. It may also have been the site of Atra'kouaer in 1654.

In the purchase of lands from the Iroquois in 1736, it is said that it was to extend westward as far as the mountains called in the Delaware language Kekkachtarin, and in the Six Nation language, Tyannuntasachta, both of which words it is stated mean The Endless Hills. In the deed of 1749 the mountains are again referred to, and the names spelled Keekachtany and Tyannuntasachta. In the deed of 1754 the Iroquois term is omitted, and the Delaware word is spelled Kittochtianny. While scholars seem to regard this as the proper orthography, the word has been corrupted into Kittatiny. The name shows the Delaware, or Leni Lenape idea of our geography, when they termed them the Endless Hills. In the deed of 1754 they are already termed the Blue Mountains, a common name to this day. In the early days the settlers in the Cumberland Valley called that portion adjoining them the North Mountain; and the one on the other side of the valley South Mountain. So we have Kittochtianny, Blue, and North, all meaning the same chain. The Indian name alone should be used; any mountain may be blue at a distance, and any one is north of some place. So we write it Kittochtianny.

MAHANTANGO is corrupted from Mohantanga, signifying where we had plenty of meat to eat.

WICONISCO is corrupted from Wikenkisteu, signifying a wet and muddy camp. Probably some Indians encamped along the creek where the bank was wet and muddy.

SWATARA is written in old deeds Esutara and Suatara; in Susquehanna, Swahadowry, corrupted from Schahadawa, i. e., where we fed on eels.

CONEWAGO or Conewauga, in Iroquois, means at the place of the rapids. From this fact there are several streams emptying into the Susquehanna so named.

MANADA, or Monody's, is corrupted from Menatey, signifying an island.

STONY CREEK. In Delaware it is Sinne-hanne, or Achsin-hanne, i. e., stony stream.

FISHING CREEK in Delaware is Namees-hanne, i. e., fish stream. There are six or seven streams of this name in Pennsylvania.

PAXTANG is a Delaware word, and is Peckstank, or Peshbank, signifying where the waters stand,—the place of dead water, whether in a stream, or pool, or lake. We use the term Paxtang, and not Paxton, which is an English surname, and should never be employed. It is not correct.

BEAVER CREEK in Delaware is Sangamochke, i. e., little beaver stream.

RACCOON CREEK in Delaware is Nachenun-hanne, i. e., raccoon stream.

CHAPTER II.

The Proprietary's Concessions—Who were the Scotch-Irish?—Their Letter to Governor Shute, of Massachusetts—Penn's Proposed Settlement on the Susquehanna.

DISCOVERY was soon followed by the advent of the whites in America, drawn thither at the first by search for gold, and then for colonization. As it is entirely out of place to treat of the early history of America, or even of Pennsylvania, save when some allusion to either may be deemed necessary, we shall proceed to give an account of the settlement of the pioneers on the Susquehanna within the limits of our own county domain. The Founder of Pennsylvania is certainly deserving of grateful remembrance for his efforts to settle his Province, to protect the pioneers, and to foster their industry. He was a remarkable man in many respects, and his "Frame of Government" is a model, unequalled by the laws of any of the colonies or provinces. Not that alone, but the "concessions" agreed upon in England for the encouragement of emigrants to his Province, is an important factor in that great movement which so materially assisted in building up this Western Empire, and gave to the world the great State "founded in peace." The "Certain Conditions or Concessions agreed upon by William Penn, Proprietary and Governor of the Province of Pennsylvania, and those the Adventurers and Purchasers in the same Province the eleventh of July, one thousand six hundred and eighty-one," are as follows:

"I. That so soon as it pleaseth God that the abovesaid persons arrive there, a certain quantity of land, or ground plat, shall be laid out, for a large town or city, in the most convenient place, upon the river, for health and navigation; and every purchaser and adventurer shall, by lot, have so much land therein as will answer to the proportion, which he hath bought, or taken up, upon rent: but it is to be noted, that the surveyors shall consider what roads or high ways will be necessary to the cities, towns, or through the lands. Great roads from city to city not to contain less than forty feet, in breadth, shall be first laid out and declared to be for high ways, before the dividend of acres be laid out for the purchaser, and the like observation to be had for the streets in the towns and cities, that there may be convenient roads and streets preserved, not to be encroached upon by any planter or builder, that none may build irregularly to the damage of another. In this, custom governs.

"II. That the land in the town be laid out together after the proportion of ten thousand acres of the whole country, that is, two hundred acres, if the place will bear it: however, that the proportion be by lot, and entire, so as those that desire to be together, especially those that are, by the catalogue, laid together may be so laid together both in the town and country.

"III. That, when the country lots are laid out, every purchaser, from one thousand, to ten thousand acres, or more, not to have above one thousand acres together, unless in three years they plant a family upon every thousand acres; but that all such as purchase together, be together; and, if as many as comply with this condition, that the whole be laid out together.

"IV. That, where any number of purchasers, more or less, whose number of acres amount to five or ten thousand acres, desire to sit together in a lot or township, they shall have their lot, or township, cast together, in such places as have convenient harbours, or navigable rivers attending it, if such can be found; and in case any one or more purchasers plant not according to agreement, in this concession, to the prejudice of others of the same township, upon complaint thereof made to the Governor, or his Deputy, with assistance, they may award (if they see cause) that the complaining purchaser may, paying the survey money, and purchase money, and interest thereof, be entitled, enrolled and lawfully invested, in the lands so not seated.

"V. That the proportion of lands that shall be laid out in the first great town or city, for every purchaser, shall be after the proportion of ten acres for every five hundred acres purchased, if the place will allow it.

"VI. That notwithstanding there be no mention made in the several deeds made to the purchasers; yet the said William Penn does accord and declare that all rivers, rivulets, woods and underwoods, waters, watercourses, quarries, mines, and minerals (except mines royal) shall be freely and fully enjoyed, and wholly by the purchasers into whose lot they fall.

"VII. That, for every fifty acres that shall be allotted to a servant at the end of his service, his quit-rent shall be two shillings per annum, and the master or owner of the servant, when he shall take up the other fifty acres, his quit-rent shall be four shillings by the year, or, if the master of the servant (by reason in the indentures he is so obliged to do) allot out to the servant fifty acres in his own division, the said master shall have, on demand, allotted him, from the Governor, the one hundred acres, at the chief rent of six shillings per annum.

"VIII. And, for the encouragement of such as are ingenious and willing to search out gold and silver mines in this province, it is hereby agreed that they have liberty to bore and dig in any man's property, fully paying the damage done; and in case a discovery should be made, that the discoverer have one-fifth, the owner of the soil (if not the discoverer) a tenth part, the Governor two-fifths, and the rest to the public treasury, saving to the King the share reserved by patent.

"IX. In every hundred thousand acres, the Governor and Proprietary by lot, reserve ten to himself, what shall lie but in one place.

"X. That every man shall be bound to plant or man so much of his share of land as shall be set out and surveyed within three years after it is so set out and surveyed, or else it shall be lawful for new comers to be settled thereupon, paying to them their survey money, and they go up higher for their shares.

"XI. There shall be no buying and selling, be it with an Indian, or one among another, of any goods to be exported, but what shall be performed in public market, when such places shall be set apart or erected, where they shall pass the public stamp or mark. If bad ware and prized as good, or deceitful in proportion or weight, to forfeit the value, as if good and full weight and proportion, to the public treasury of this province, whether it be the merchandize of the Indian or that of the planters.

"XII. And inasmuch as it is usual with the planters to overreach the poor natives of the country in trade, by goods not being good of the kind or debased with mixtures, with which they are sensibly aggrieved, it is agreed whatever is sold to the Indians, in consideration of their furs, shall be sold in the market-place, and there enter the test whether good or bad; if good, to pass; if not good, not to be sold for good, that the natives may not be abused nor provoked.

"XIII. That no man shall, by any ways or means, in word or deed, affront or wrong any Indian, but he shall incur the same penalty of the law as if he had committed it against his fellow-planter, and if any Indian shall stune, in word or deed, any planter of this Province, that he shall not be his own judge upon the Indian, but he shall make his complaint to the Governor of the Province, or his Lieutenant or Deputy, or some inferior Magistrate near him, who shall to the utmost of his power take care with the King of the said Indian, that all reasonable satisfaction be made to the said injured planter.

"XIV. That all differences between the planters and the natives shall also be ended by twelve men, that is, by six planters and six natives; that so we may live friendly together as much as in us lieth, preventing all occasions of heart-burnings and mischief.

"XV. That the Indians shall have liberty to do all things relating to improvement of their ground, and providing sustenance for their families that any of the planters shall enjoy.

"XVI. That the laws as to slanders, drunkenness, swearing, cursing, pride in apparel, trespasses, distresses, replevins, weights and measures, shall be the same as in England till altered by law in this province.

"XVII. That all shall mark their hogs, sheep, and other cattle, and what are not marked within three months after it is in their possession, be it young or old, it shall be forfeited to the Governor, that so people may be compelled to avoid the occasions of much strife between planters.

"XVIII. That, in clearing the ground, care be taken to leave one acre of trees for every five acres cleared, especially to preserve oak and mulberries for silk and shipping.

"XIX. That all shipmasters shall give an account of their countries, names, ships, owners, freights, and passengers, to an officer to be appointed for that purpose, which shall be registered within two days after their arrival, and if they shall refuse so to do, that then none presume to trade with them, upon forfeiture thereof; and that such masters be looked upon as having an evil intention to the province.

"XX. That no person leave the province without publication being made thereof in the market-place three weeks before, and a certificate from some Justice of the Peace, of his clearness with his neighbors and those he dealt with, so far as such an assurance can be attained and given; and if any master of a ship shall, contrary hereto, receive and carry away any person that hath not given that public notice, the said master shall be liable to all debts owing by the said person, so secretly transported from the province.

"Lastly. That these are to be added to or corrected by and with the consent of the parties herunto subscribed."

The inducements offered by Penn to settlers were not confined to right of soil or voice in government, but religious toleration was guaranteed by him. The law of religious liberty, as framed by him and passed by the first Assembly at Chester, 10th December, 1682, is as follows:

"CHAPTER I. Almighty God being only Lord of conscience, Father of Lights and Spirits, and the author as well as object of all Divine Knowledge, faith and worship, who only can enlighten the mind and persuade and convince the understandings of people; In due reverence to His sovereignty over the souls of mankind;

Be it enacted, That no person, now or at any time hereafter, living in this Province, who shall confess and acknowledge one Almighty God to be the Creator, upholder, and Ruler of the world, and who professes him or herself obliged in conscience to live peaceably and quietly under the civil government, shall, in any case be molested or prejudiced for his or her conscientious persuasion or practice. Nor shall he or she, at any time, be compelled to frequent or maintain any religious worship, place or ministry whatever, contrary to his or her mind, but shall freely and fully enjoy his or her Christian liberty in that respect, without any interruption or reflection. And if any person shall abuse or deride any other for his or her different persuasion and practice in matters of religion, such person shall be looked upon as a disturber of the peace, and be punished accordingly.

"But to the end that looseness, irreligion, and atheism may not creep in under pretense of conscience in this Province; Be it further enacted, &c., That, according to the example of the primitive Christians, and for the ease of the creation, every first day of the week, called the Lord's Day, people shall abstain from their usual and common toil and labor, that whether masters, parents, children, or servants, they may the better dispose themselves to read the Scriptures of truth, at home, or frequent such meetings of religious worship abroad as may best suit their respective persuasions."

And thus Pennsylvania became the refuge and home of people of all creeds or religious beliefs. The foregoing was one of the first laws of the Province, and during the lifetime of the Founder the liberty of conscience was not questioned. At a later day, however, his religious adherents would have throttled toleration had they not feared revolution.

Elsewhere we give an account of the German emigration which preceded by several decades that to which we shall now refer,—the coming of the Scotch-Irish. And who were the Scotch-Irish? At the first used as a term of reproach, to us it has become a synonym of enterprise, intelligence, patriotism, and religious fervor, and it is proper that in this connection we present a few points in the history of that persevering and undaunted race.

It was during the reign of good Queen Bess—the proud Elizabeth of all England—that through treason, tyranny, and rebellion, the Province of Ulster, especially the counties of Downe, Londonderry, and Antrim, Ireland, was reduced to the lowest extreme of poverty and wretchedness, while its moral and religious state was scarcely less deplorable.

Soon after the accession of James I., O'Neill, the Earl of Tyrone, and O'Donnell, the Earl of Tyrconnel, were falsely accused of having arranged a plot against the government. An accusation being at those times tantamount to a conviction, compelled those thus arraigned to fly the country, leaving their extensive estates (about five hundred thousand acres) at the mercy of the king, who at once confiscated them. A subsequent supposed threatened insurrection, promptly suppressed, gave occasion for another large forfeiture, and nearly six entire counties in the Province of Ulster were sequestered and subjected to the disposal of the crown. Any country passing through such an ordeal of turbulence could not be otherwise than almost depopulated, with resources wasted and the cultivation of the soil in a great measure abandoned. And such was the true condition of Ulster. To repeople the country it was determined to invite the settlement of Protestants from England and Scotland, and hence liberal offers of land were made for colonists to occupy this wide and vacant country, the better to preserve order, to establish more firmly the British rule, and to secure loyalty. The project was eagerly embraced, companies were formed, and individuals without organization were tempted to partake of the advantageous offers of the government. A London company—among the first to enter upon the new acquisition—established itself at Derry, and gave such character to the place as to cause it to be known and called the city of Londonderry.

The principal emigration, however, was from Scotland. Its coast is within twenty miles of the county of Antrim, Ireland, and across this strait flowed from the northeast a large population, distinguished for thrift, industry, and endurance, and bringing with them their Presbyterianism and rigid adherence to the Westminster standards. This was the first Protestant population that was introduced into Ireland, and the Presbyterians of Scotland who thus furnished the largest element have maintained their ascendancy to the present day against all the persevering efforts of the government church.

The Province of Ulster, in consequence of this influx of population, greatly revived and continued for some years to advance in prosperity. In time the throne of England was controlled by bigotry and despotism. Persecutions of an oppressive nature began in Ulster in 1661, and every expedient was tried to break down the attachment of the people to the faith of their fathers; yet, as is ever the case, persecution only attached the people the stronger to Presbyterianism.

From Ireland the tide of persecution rolled to Scotland. The latter Stuarts,—Charles II. and James II.,—blind to the dictates of justice and humanity, pursued a system of measures best calculated to wean from their support their Presbyterian subjects who were bound to them by national prejudice and had been most devoted to their kingly cause, and to whose assistance Charles II. owed his restoration to the throne. Sir James Graham, better known as Claverhouse, was sent to Scotland with his dragoons upon the mistaken mission of compelling the Presbyterians to conform in their religious worship to that of the establishment; and from 1670 until the accession of William and Mary the Covenanters of Scotland worshipped in hidden places and at the peril of their lives.

The attempt of the Stuarts to destroy the religious system so universally established and so dearly cherished by that devoted people was steadily pursued by persecution as cruel and as savage as any which has disgraced the annals of religious bigotry and crime. Many were treacherously and ruthlessly butchered, and the ministers were prohibited, under severe penalties, from preaching, baptizing, or ministering in any way to their flocks.

There are some matters connected with these persecutions which may not be uninteresting. From 1660 to 1688 no less than eighteen thousand Scotch Presbyterians were put to death in various ways in defense of the solemn league and covenant and Christ's headship over the Church. In looking over the list of names one is forcibly struck with the fact that among them are the very surnames of the Scotch-Irish emigrants to this section of Pennsylvania,—Alison, Stewart, Gray, Thompson, Murray, Robinson, Rutherford, McCormick, Mitchell, Kerr, Todd, Beatty, Johnston, Hamilton, Finley, McCord, McEwen, Hall, Boyd, Clark, Sloan, Elder, Forster, Montgomery, Robertson, and others. It would thus seem that we have here the lineal descendants of those who loved not their lives unto the death, but were drowned, hanged, shot, beheaded, and their heads stuck upon poles, their bodies chopped in pieces and scattered about, in the days of that human monster, Claverhouse. Through their blood shed in defense of religious liberty we enjoy many and great privileges.

Worn out with the unequal contest, these persistent and enduring Presbyterians took refuge from persecution—abandoned the land of their birth—and sought an asylum among their countrymen who had preceded them in the secure retreats of Ulster, and thither they escaped as best they could, some crossing the narrow sea in open boats. They carried their household gods with them, and their religious peculiarities became more dear in their land of exile for the dangers and sorrows through which they had borne them.

This is the race which furnished the population in the north of Ireland, familiarly known as the Scotch-Irish. This term—American in its origin, and unknown in Ireland—does not denote an admixture of the Scotch and Irish races. The one did not intermarry with the other. The Scotch were principally Saxon in blood and Presbyterian in religion; the native Irish Celtic in blood and Roman Catholic in religion; and these were elements which could not very readily coalesce. Hence the races are as distinct in Ireland at the present day as when the Scotch first took up their abode in that island. They were called Scotch-Irish simply from the circumstance that they were the descendants of Scots who had taken up their residence in the North of Ireland.

Taxation and oppression, however, with difficulties partly political, partly religious, no doubt were the strong motives which one hundred and seventy years ago induced the Scotch-Irish to leave Ireland. It was not the home of their ancestors, it was endeared to them by no traditions, and they sought and obtained in the wilds of Pennsylvania a better home than they had in the Old World.

The emigration began prior to 1718, although few in number, and in illustration of the commencement of Scotch-Irish settlement in America, we give herewith the "memorial to Governor Shute, of Massachusetts, from residents in the north of Ireland." The memorial is important to us, from the fact that the great majority of the signers subsequently found homes in Paxtang, Hanover, and Derry.

"To His Excellency, the Right Honorable Colonel Samuel Shute, Governour of New England.

"We, whose names are underwritten, Inhabitants of ye North of Ireland, Doe in our own names, and in the names of many others our Neighbours, Gentlemen, Ministers, Farmers, and Tradesmen, Commissionate and appoint our trusty and well-beloved Friend, the Reverend Mr. William Boyd, of Meacsky, to His Excellency the Right Honorable Colonel Samuel Shute, Governour of New England, and to assure His Excellency of our sincere and hearty Inclination to Transport ourselves to that very excellent and renowned Plantation, upon our Obtaining from His Excellency suitable encouragement; and, further, to act and Doe in our names as his Prudence shall direct. Given under our hands this 26th day of March, Anno Dom. 1718.

Extensive emigrations from the northern counties of Ireland were principally made at two distinct periods of time. The first from about the year 1717 to the middle of the century, the second from about 1771 to 1773. They were Protestants, generally Presbyterians,—few or none of the Roman Catholic Irish came until after the war of the Revolution, and few then until after the great political upheaval in 1798, since which period, as we all know, the flow of the latter class of immigrants has been continuous.

The Scotch-Irish emigrants landed principally at New Castle and Philadelphia, save a handful who had settled on the Kennebec in Maine, and of these the greater portion eventually came into Pennsylvania. Settling on the frontiers from Easton to the Susquehanna, and the Potomac, the stream of immigration continued south to Virginia and the Carolinas.

The country north of the Swatara had not been visited save by French Indians prior to the coming of William Penn. After his first visit he seems to have been well informed concerning this locality and personally visited it, and at or above the mouth of the Swatara decided to locate a city, and the following proposals were issued therefor in 1690. It is easily understood why the project was never carried out. The careful reader of Pennsylvania history will readily comprehend the peculiar conditions surrounding the founder. His government of his Province was giving him serious concern. The material composing his Assembly was of that stubborn, self-willed character that little could be done, and he had as much as he could do in the preservation and fostering of those enterprises he had already begun. Nevertheless, as a document of more than local interest, it is herewith given:

"Some Proposals for a second Settlement in the Province of Pennsylvania.

"Whereas, I did, about nine years past, propound the selling of several parts or shares of land, upon that side of the Province of Pennsylvania next Delaware river, and setting out of a place upon it for the

"On Tuesday, the 1st July, 1707, we went to Conestoga, and lay there that night, and the next morning proceeded on our journey, and arrived in the evening within three miles of an Indian village called Peixtan. The Governor had received information at Pequban that one Nicole, a French Indian trader, was at that place, against whom great complaints had been made to the Governor, of which he acquainted the chief Indian at Peixtan, as also of his design to seize him, who willingly agreed to it, but advised the Governor to be very cautious in the manner, there being only young people at home, who perhaps might make some resistance if it were done without their being told of it. For this reason we lay short of the village that night, but early in the morning we went within a half-mile of the town, and, leaving our horses, marched afoot near the same, from whence the Governor sent Martine to the village, ordering him to tell Nicole that he had brought two kegs of rum with him, which he had left in the woods for fear any Christians were there; and withal to persuade Nicole to go with him and taste the rum. Martine returned with James Letort and Joseph Jessop, two Indian traders, but could not prevail with Nicole; upon which Martine was sent back with orders to bring down some Indians, and Nicole with them. Then we drew nearer to town and laid ourselves in the bushes; and Martine returned with two Indians whom the Governor acquainted with his intention of taking Nicole, telling at the same time that he had spoken with the uncle of one of them upon that head, who ordered the Indians to submit to the Governor's commands, with which they were contented, though we perceived too well the contrary by their inquiring how many we were, and how armed, and the concern they seemed to be in when they found we were in more number than they. But still Nicole was wanting. It was therefore resolved to try once more if he could be got into the woods. Accordingly, Martine went again to the place, and brought Nicole where we lay concealed, and asking him to drink a dram, he seized him; but Nicole started from him and ran for it, when immediately we started out and took him, and presently carried him to the village (Peixtan), through which we were obliged to pass; and there we found some Indians with guns in their hands, who looked much displeas'd at what we had done, but being in readiness against any surprise, they thought it not fit to attempt anything. Here we staid about half an hour, and then started for Turpy-hocken [Tulpehocken], having mounted Nicole on a horse and tied his legs under the belly; we went within a mile of Turpyhocken about two of the clock. On Friday morning about seven the Governor went to the town; from thence we went to Manatawoey that night, and the next day to Philadelphia."

CHAPTER III.

John Harris, the First White Settler—The Assessment List of 1718—Prices of Land, and Early Warrantes for Paxtang, Derry, Hanover, Londonderry, and Upper Paxtang Townships.

THE first English trader we hear of within the limits of the county was John Harris. The fears of the French, who were constantly gaining ground in the northwestern part of the Province, and especially of "Papists," which all at once seems to have filled our Quaker friends with terror, it made it absolutely necessary to license only English traders, and they of Protestant proclivities, so as to prevent communication with the French on the Ohio. Among the first was John Harris, who perchance entered this then lucrative field, the Indian trade, at the suggestion of his most intimate friend, Edward Shippen, Provincial Secretary.

Of the John Harris who thus located permanently at Harrisburg, and who gave name to that city, it may not be inappropriate to refer. "He was as honest a man as ever broke bread," was the high eulogium pronounced by Parson Elder, of blessed memory, as he spoke of the pioneer in after-years. Born in the county of Yorkshire, England, although of Welsh descent, about the year 1673, he was brought up in the trade of his father, that of a brewer. Leaving his home on reaching his majority, he worked at his calling some time in the city of London, where he joined, a few years afterwards, a company from his native district, who emigrated to Pennsylvania two or three years prior to Penn's second visit to his Province. Watson states that John Harris' "entire capital amounted to only sixteen guineas."

We first hear of him after his arrival in Philadelphia as a contractor for clearing and grading the streets of that ancient village. In 1698 his name is appended to a remonstrance to the Provincial Assembly against the passage of an act disallowing the franchise to all persons owning real estate less in value than fifty pounds. The memorial had its effect, and the objectionable law was repealed. By letters of introduction to Edward Shippen, the first mayor of Philadelphia, that distinguished gentleman became his steadfast friend, and through his influence, no doubt, were secured those favors which induced him eventually to become the first permanent settler in this locality.

In January, 1705, John Harris received his license from the commissioners of property, authorizing and allowing him to "seat himself on the Sasquahannah," and "to erect such buildings as are necessary for his trade, and to enclose and improve such quantities of land as he shall think fit." At once he set about building a log house near the Ganawese (Conoy) settlement, but the Indians made complaint to the government that it made them "uneasie," desiring to know if they encouraged it. As in numerous instances when the provincial authorities were taken to task, they disavowed their own acts. Nevertheless, the "trader" continued his avocation, making frequent visits to the Shawanese villages at the Conewago and Swatara. It is doubtful if John Harris came farther west until after the permanent removal of all the French traders.

It was during one of his expeditions that Harris first beheld the beauty and advantages of the location at Paxtang. It was the best fording-place on the Susquehanna, and then, as now in these later days, on the great highway between the North and South, the East and the West. Annually the chiefs of the Five Nations went to the Carolinas, where were located their vast hunting-grounds, and these, returning with peltries, found need of a trading-post. The eye of that hardy pioneer, looking out over the vast expanse of wood, and plain, and river, saw and knew that it was the place for the realization of that fond dream of the founder of Pennsylvania, the great and good Penn, "a city on the Susquehanna." At the period referred to, the lands lying between the Conewago or Lechay Hills and the Kittochtinny or Blue Mountains had not been purchased from the Indians. Of course neither John Harris nor the Scotch-Irish settlers could locate except by the right of squatter sovereignty or as licensed traders. As a trader, it could only be with the permission of the Indians.

Harris' first move was the erection of a store-house, which he surrounded by a stockade. It was located on the lower bank of the river, at about what is now the foot of Paxtang Street. A well dug by him still exists, although covered over about twenty-five years ago, the old pump stock having become useless and the platform dangerous. A mound or hillock about one hundred feet southeast of the graveyard denotes the spot. "For almost a century," in the language of the late David Harris, "this well supplied a large neighborhood with water, which was exceedingly cool and pleasant to the taste." Adjoining his cabin were sheds for the housing of peltries obtained by traffic, which at stated periods were conveyed to Philadelphia on pack-horses.

Some years prior to 1718 an incident took place in the life of John Harris which has received all sorts of versions, and even doubts of its truthfulness. We shall give it as we believe it, and as traditionary and other facts in our possession supply the material therefor. All the French traders having "gone over Sasquahannah," John Harris monopolized the business at Paxtang. In glancing over the records of the Province of Pennsylvania, frequent allusions are made to the excursions of the northern Indians, either to hunting-grounds in the South or to a conflict with a deadly foe. At one time the Onondagoes, on a predatory excursion against the Talapoosas, in Virginia, descending the Susquehanna, left their canoes at Harris', proceeding thence to the scene of strife. Situated as he was, at the best ford on the river, he commanded an extensive trade. His Indian neighbors (Shawanese) were very friendly, and of course would not allow any strange or predatory bands to molest him. The deadly foe of the red race is rum, and although the selling of it was expressly forbidden by the provincial authorities, yet there was scarcely a treaty or conference without this portion being a part of the presents made by the refined white man to his ignorant red brother. Of a consequence liquor was sold, and we are told by Conrad Weiser that on one occasion "on the Sasquahannah," the Indians whom he was conducting to Philadelphia became so drunk that he was fearful of them and left them. At the period first referred to, it seems a predatory band of Indians, on returning from the Carolinas, or the "Patowmack," naturally halted at John Harris'. In exchanging part of their goods, probably rum—for this seems to have been the principal beverage drunk at that period—was one of the articles in barter. At least we have it by tradition that the Indians became riotous in their drunken revelry, and demanding more rum, were refused by Mr. Harris, who began to fear harm from his visitors. Not to be denied, they again demanded liquor, and seizing him, they took him to a tree near by, binding him thereto. After helping themselves to whatever they wanted of his stores, they danced around the unhappy captive, who no doubt thought his death was nigh.

Prior to this the Indian village of Paxtang had been deserted, and the inhabitants removed to the west side of the Susquehanna. On the bluff opposite John Harris', as also at the mouth of the Yellow Breeches, there were lodges of Shawanese, and these held our Indian trader in high esteem. Information was taken them by Mr. Harris' negro servant, when at once were summoned the warriors, who crossed the river, where, after a slight struggle with the drunken Indians, they rescued from a death of torture their white friend.

Although no mention of these facts is made in the provincial records, there may possibly have been good reason therefor, and it is well known that many incidents, well authenticated in later years, have not been noted in the documents referred to. By tradition and private sources alone are they preserved from oblivion. It was no myth, this attempt to burn John Harris, and although the pen and pencil have joined in making therefrom a romance and heightened it with many a gaudy coloring, yet accurate resources have furnished us with the details here given.

The remains of this tree, which in the memory of the oldest inhabitant bore fruit, stands within the inclosure at Harris Park, a striking memento of that thrilling incident. The late George W. Harris furnished the author with certain corroboratory traditional evidence, which is herewith given. That it did occur was not only traditional in the Harris family but in others. The writer's grandmother, Mrs. Elizabeth (Thomas) Egle, tarried when a child of fifteen at John Harris', her father then being on his way from Philadelphia to his home at his mill on the Yellow Breeches. John Harris, the founder, in the course of conversation with her father alluded to the mulberry-tree and the rude inclosure of the graves at its foot, and distinctly remembered then hearing the story in detail which we have given.

Robert Harris, a grandson of the Indian trader, stated it as a fact in which he believed. According to a memorandum, made in his lifetime, he stated that a band of Indians came to the house of his grandfather and demanded rum. He saw that they were intoxicated, and he feared mischief if he gave them more rum. They became enraged and tied him to the tree for burning. The alarm was given, and Indians from the opposite side of the river came and, after a struggle, released him.

Esther, a daughter of the first John Harris, left three daughters: Elizabeth, married to Samuel Mac-lay; Isabella, married to William Bell, of New York; and Margaret, married to Isaac Richardson, of Pennsylvania, and then or subsequently living in York County. All of these granddaughters made statements in relation to the occurrence in question.

In the year 1840, G. W. Harris had a conversation with Mrs. Bell on this subject. She stated that she was born in 1760. That in 1766 she was coming from Carlisle, where she lived, to Harrisburg with her father and some of her sisters. When they came to the river opposite to Harrisburg, where William Harris was then living, some of the children pointed to an old man fishing in the river, and they mentioned that he had saved the life of his master, John Harris, from the Indians. She said that she understood it to be when he was tied to the mulberry-tree.

Robert Maclay, of Kishacoquillas Valley, Mifflin County, wrote some years ago a statement as to this matter, from information obtained from his mother and her sisters, Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Richardson. His statement is to the effect that a party of Indians came to trade, and after obtaining what Mr. Harris had given to them, or traded for, they demanded rum, which he refused. They then determined to burn him, and bound him with hickory withes to a mulberry-tree on the bank of the river, and commenced gathering and piling wood around him. While they were gathering wood his negro man Hercules slipped off and informed friendly Indians on the opposite side of the river, who at once came in sufficient force to rescue and save his master. He added, as the statement of these ladies, that Mr. Harris set Hercules free, and that afterwards he directed that he should be buried under the mulberry-tree. Hercules died a considerable time after the death of John Harris, and is buried there.

Mr. Maclay also furnished a statement, which he had heard from his mother, to the effect that some friends endeavored to dissuade the old gentleman, Mr. Harris, from his determination to be buried under the mulberry-tree, alleging that the river-bank was being washed away and the grave might be exposed and perhaps washed away, and that he ought to be buried in the Paxtang church graveyard, but that he silenced all argument by saying that if you bury me out in Paxtang, I'll get up and come back. One of his daughters, Mrs. Elizabeth Finley, is also buried under the mulberry-tree.

Here, then, is the statement of Robert Harris, a grandson of John Harris, and of three of his granddaughters to the alleged occurrence at the mulberry-tree, and Mr. Harris adds that Mrs. Bell and Mrs. Richardson were known to him, and were persons of superior intellect.

Robert Maclay also mentioned an incident, as derived from the same source, that an Indian, in a distressed condition, on a cold night, came to the house of John Harris and sought admission. He was received, and lay by the fire during the night. When the Indians came to the relief of John Harris it is said that this Indian was with them.

As to whether the alarm was given by Hercules, in a conversation with Robert Harris, about the year 1840, in which he said that the alarm on the occasion in question was not given by Hercules, but in some other way, how he did not know; but that Hercules had saved the life of his master on another occasion, I think he said when he was endangered from a steer in a flat on the river. But Mr. Samuel Breck, of Philadelphia, previous to October, 1827, wrote an account relative to Harrisburg, in which, in reference to this alleged occurrence at the mulberry-tree, he states that the Indians who came to the relief of John Harris were led by Hercules, and he adds that the narrative was submitted in substance to the inspection of Mr. Robert Harris, and declared by him to be correct.

When the picture representing that scene (in possession of the State of Pennsylvania) was painted by Reeder, who was in communication with Robert Harris, the latter, it would seem, was of opinion that the alarm was not given by Hercules, and Hercules did not appear in it. His attention may not have been directed especially to the statement relative to Hercules in the narrative of Mr. Breck, or his subsequent recollection may have been at fault. The burden of evidence seems to be that the alarm was given by Hercules, and if it were he is entitled to representation in the picture.

We have been thus explicit because the incident has been stated as untrue, and hence have given such traditional evidence as it has been possible to obtain.

Following the advent of the trader, as emigration to Pennsylvania increased, pressed towards the banks of the Susquehanna the early pioneer. The first assessment-list for what was subsequently Lancaster County is that of the township of "Conestogoe," Chester County, for the year 1718. This was the name of the outlying township of the latter county, which, in 1722, we find to be divided into East and West Conestogoe townships, and from the latter, in 1725, the township of Donegal. As many of the names in the organization of townships and counties belonged eventually to the county of Dauphin, we give the list entire, and the names as in the original. At the period noted the number of "residents taxable" was one hundred and twenty-nine, and the amount of tax levied £40 10s. 1½d.

William Penn, the first proprietary, died in England in 1718, and his son Thomas continued in his minority until 1731; Richard, his other son, until 1732. In this interval their land-office was shut up, so that during that time warrants and patents were not regularly granted by the commissioners of property for transferring lands to applicants. To further the settlement of the then Province within that period, tickets signed by one of the commissioners of property, or by the secretary of the land-office, came into practice. Hence, it would seem, sprung up improvements. The old rule being once relaxed, greater liberties were taken by the people, and emigrants from abroad often seated themselves on vacant lands without permission, and made valuable improvements. The usage of the proprietary land-office was favorable to these settlements. The interests of the proprietaries were promoted, and the pre-emption of the lands they occupied was generally considered as belonging to the settlers. The inhabitants of the frontier counties in particular availed themselves of the usage, and in many instances went much further than was ever intended by the lords of the soil or their officers.

Thomas Penn arrived at Philadelphia in 1732. No warrants appear to have been issued to take up land, but only to resurvey, from 1730 to 1733, when Thomas Penn first signed warrants; and in that year he signed many warrants to settlers for lands, and even stating settlements made many years before.

The prices for land varied. Previous to 1732 there were no fixed prices. The terms agreed upon appear to have been regulated by cash payments, and the annual quit-rents to be afterwards paid. As early as 1684, all warrants were conditional, containing a clause that the land should be improved within a specified time or the warrant to be void. The time varied from six months to a year, and in a few cases to two or more years; and which continued until after 1730, and this may partially account that the urgent request made by old and confidential officers for the establishing a uniform price was constantly rejected.

Perhaps, to understand this subject the better, it should be borne in mind that the proprietary, although Governor and political head of the Province, yet carefully and rigidly kept up the distinction between his political and private rights. He exercised the same absolute power to sell, to whom he pleased, and on what terms he pleased, which every owner of lands exercises, and resisted any interference of the Assembly with these rights constantly and successfully, by his personal influence or that of his Governors here, or by procuring the repeal by the king in council of every law infringing on such his private rights. As a result, prices varied for the first half-century—greatly varied—every month and week and day, by him and his commissioners of property; in short, that difference in price of lands nearly contiguous, or actually contiguous, was what constantly occurred. There was not always injustice or impropriety in this; the difference of soil or location may have been the cause. Besides, it must be recollected that for more than half a century cash was not generally paid on taking out a warrant. The price then very often, if not always, depended in some degree upon the ability to pay cash in hand. No man of his day was more distressed for money than William Penn. He was obliged to mortgage his Province, and was confined for debt in the Fleet Prison in England. Necessity compelled him, therefore, to sell for cash at very low rates; and the propriety and moral necessity of having his Province settled and cultivated made it proper to sell to those who would cultivate and improve the country, and agree to pay interest.

Those who had purchased warrants from William Penn in England, and who had deeds, generally took warrants to survey their lands, and often the first warrant was for only a part, and they might take another warrant or warrants for the residue of their purchase, or might sell the whole or a part, or several parts to several persons, each of whom could take a warrant for his quantity or portion. These were called first purchases. On these warrants, or their alienees, no money was due, and no price mentioned.

From and after 1732 until the 27th of December, 1762, the price was £15 10s. per cent.; interest charged from six months after the date of the warrant when the land was not improved, but if improved, then from the commencement thereof. From Dec. 27, 1762, to Dec. 27, 1763, the price was £9, currency, per cent. From Dec. 27, 1763, to Aug. 6, 1765, the price was again £15 10s. per cent.; but if the land was improved previously to 1762, £15 10s., and interest accordingly. From Aug. 6, 1765, to July 1, 1784, the price was £5 sterling for unimproved land; but if improved, the time at which the improvement was made governed the price. It may be stated in this connection that no price was ever fixed for lands within the manors or proprietary surveys, these being the private property of the proprietaries. The commissioners of property generally sold them at a higher rate than other lands, or on warrants "to agree." In 1739 and ever afterwards they were sold by special agents under special powers.

It is much to be regretted that the correspondence between the proprietaries and their secretary, James Logan, and the provincial surveyors from 1710 to 1740 has never been collated. It would greatly subserve the interests of our early history by throwing light upon a number of transactions in land, and the cause of the state of feeling on the part of the early settlers. The Scotch-Irish were not treated with the same consideration accorded the Germans and Swiss. The latter could locate anywhere, the former not. The Scotch-Irish settled on the manor of Conestoga, but they were removed by force, their cabins burned, and told to go beyond the Conewago. The Germans occupied immediately the land from which the Scotch-Irish had been driven, and warrants therefor to them shortly afterwards granted. All except less than five hundred acres of this celebrated manor was taken up by German settlers, and that was a locality where a few Shawanese Indians had planted themselves, and which in our subsequent history became more than notorious. The Scotch-Irish ejected from the purchased and surveyed lands were pushed across the Conewago and Swatara, where they were allowed to remain. Many of these had settled ten to fifteen years upon the land ere the surveyors entered upon it, and the privilege was afforded to take out warrants. Applications were made at once, but many years elapsed ere the warrant was issued, and frequently the right was transferred by one to another through purchase ere right in the soil was secured from the land-office.

We herewith give the record of such warrants. Many who secured the original warrants sold within a few days thereafter a portion of their land to their neighbors or relatives, as an examination of deeds will evidence. Many of those for whom twenty-five or fifty acres are warranted were for lands adjoining their other lauds. There will no doubt be a surprise to our readers at the absence of names of individuals who it is well known were early settlers. This is due to the fact that deeds were given by the proprietaries to the "original purchasers" and others of large tracts of land, giving simply the names of the counties and sometimes the manors in which they were located. These persons sold to many of the early settlers, and although the latter were really the persons entitled to the original warrants, yet through either being relieved from quit-rent or perchance purchasing on more favorable terms, their deeds to the soil came not through the land-office, but through speculators and others.

The date of the warrant is far from the date of settlement. It is frequently stated in these that the land had been settled some years previously. Frequently the interest was to be computed from a period many years anterior to the date of warrants, and to these we have affixed an asterisk (*), which give the date interest commences, and that may have been years after a permanent improvement had been made. There is one thing to the credit of the proprietaries be it said, they never attempted to collect interest beyond the date of purchase from the Indians, but those who had already made improvements a higher price was fixed for land and for quit-rents.

Few, perchance, will attach any particular importance to the record of early warrants given. It has been a work of considerable labor and research, and if not interesting reading in the main, is of real historic value.

It is not to be denied that the Proprietaries had a great deal of trouble with their land. The fact is there were too many "original purchasers," and these seem to have had privileges and advantages which no settler had, and the land-office was for many years in a state of confusion. The following letter from Thomas Penn, one of the Proprietaries, to Secretary Logan, is of valued reference in this connection. The paper was indorsed "Terms for ye Donegallians," but as will be seen were to apply to the townships north of Donegal,—Paxtang, Hanover, Derry, and Lebanon, and is dated "Philada., 23d Jany, 1733."

"LOVING FRIEND: On the Receipt of thy Letter & paper read to the Inhabitants of Donegal, & persnal of them, I found the proposals were disadvantageous to us, & began to Consider the reasons for granting to those people their Lands at a Rate much more moderate than other persons generally pay. 'Tis true some of them applied to the Commissioners before their Settlement, whereas others went without thinking that formality Necessary, but there they have been settled 12 or 15 Years, have paid no Consideration for that favour, neither think they ought. All y't can give them room to expect an answer agreeable to their Inclinations must be from the Services their old Friend may have done them, with me joynd to thy Endeavours, for the Speedy Ste't of their Estates, which all reasonable men would have been uneasy should have been so long delay'd y't have made any Valuable Improvements on the Land.

"For my Last answer to any applications from that Township, I do agree that the Inhabitants shall have their Choice of these 3 proposals:
 "Either to pay 16 : 15 & one Shilling a Hund. @ Quitrent.

 6 : 10 & 1 penny Sterl. an acre.

"The persons must unke Choice before the 1st Day of March next which of these terms they choose to Comply with, & the Consideration money must be that Day paid, or Interest for the Delay, which will be expected shall not be long. The Quitrent commences from the 1st Day of March next, pursuant to which I desire requests may be drawn up, and when thou shalt know how the people shall choose, I desire to be acquainted therewith."

On the 24th of January, Thomas Penn writes to Secretary Logan on the same subject :

"LOVING FRIEND: Having Considered the terms I am willing to offer to the Inhabitants of the Townships under thy Care North of Donegal, as the people are generally unable to pay money, I shall agree that from the first Day of March next, three years & a half shall be allowed them to provide 15£ 10 Shil. for each hundred acres, and that no Interest shall, at the expiration of that time, be demanded for the Delay; that one-half penny an acre, Sterl. money, shall be reserved for the quitrent, & that no persons who shall hereafter settle on the Lands in Your County shall be entitled to any such Length of time, but that all persons settling without proper authority shall be removed in such manner as the Law directs."

The wanton destruction, or carelessness, referable to the county officials of Lancaster, extending over one hundred and fifty years, prevents us from furnishing more interesting facts relating to the coming of the early settlers. Were the assessment-lists in existence from 1730 to the present time positive information could be obtained as to date of settlement, the year of removal, as also those of birth and death.

About the year 1740 the influx of Scotch-Irish was so great that family after family removed down the valley to the Potomac, and beyond to Virginia and the Carolinas, and this tide of emigration was one continued stream until the thunders of the Revolution checked emigration to America. They can be traced from their resting-place among their relations and friends in the townships of Paxtang, Hanover, and Derry to their descendants of the present day, who are prominent among the representative people of the South. The assessment-lists of some of the townships referred to for certain years prior to 1760 contain double the number of names found later on, showing how like bees they swarmed out from the parent hive and sought other, and perchance, more congenial localities.

The "act for erecting the upper part of the Province of Pennsylvania lying towards Susquehannah, Conestogue, Donegal, etc., into a county," became a law on the 10th of May, 1729, and recites as follows :

"WHEREAS, a great number of the Inhabitants of the Upper Parts of Chester County have by their Petition humbly represented to the Governor and Assembly of the Province, the great Hardships they lie under by being at so great a Distance from the Town of Chester, where the Courts of Justice are held, and the Public offices kept; and how hard and difficult it is for the Sober and quiet Inhabitants of that part of the County to secure themselves against the Thefts and Abuses almost daily committed upon them by Idle and dissolute persons, who resort to the remote parts of the Province, and by reason of the great Distance from a Court or Prison, do frequently find means of making their escape; For the removing which inconvenience, and Relief of the said Inhabitants,

"Be it enacted by the Honourable PATRICK GORDON, Esq., Governour of the Province of Pennsylvania, &c., by & with the advice and consent of the Freemen of the said Province, in General Assembly met, and by the Authority of the same, That all and singular the Lands within the Province of Pennsylvania, lying to the Northward of Octoraro Creek, and to the Westward of a Line of marked Trees, running from the North Branch of the said Octoraro Creek, North-Easterly to the River Schuylkill, Be erected into a County, and the same is hereby erected into a County named, & from henceforth to be called LANCASTER COUNTY; And the said Octoraro Creek, the Line of marked Trees, and the River Schuylkill, aforesaid, shall be the boundary Line of Division between the said County and the Countys of Chester and Philadelphia.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the said County of Lancaster, shall have and enjoy all and singular the Jurisdictions, Powers, Rights, Liberties, Privileges & Immunities whatsoever, which any other County within the Province of Pennsylvania doth, may or ought to enjoy, by any Charter of Privileges, or the Laws of this Province, or by any other Ways or means whatsoever, excepting only in the number of Representatives to serve in the General Assembly of this Province, in which case, it is hereby provided and enacted by the authority aforesaid, that, until it shall be otherwise ordered by the Governor and Assembly of this Province, the Freemen and Inhabitants of the said county, qualified by the Laws of this Province to elect, shall annually meet at or near the Court House of the said County, at the same time the other Counties of this Province shall meet for such like Purposes, or at such place where the Courts shall be held, until such Court House shall be erected, and there proceed to choose Inspectors, and to elect four Representatives or Delegates to serve them in Assembly, in the same manner, as by the said Charter and Laws of this Province is directed: which said four Representatives, when so chosen, shall be Members of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, and sit and act as such, as fully and freely, as any of the Representatives for the other Counties within this Province do, may, can, or ought to do.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all Taxes already laid within the bounds of the said County of Lancaster, by an Act of General Assembly of this Province, which are not already paid, shall be collected by the respective collectors within the bounds aforesaid, and paid into the hands of the Treasurer of Chester County; and that all persons concerned in the Levying, receiving and paying the said Taxes shall have the same Power and Authority, and be under the same penalties and Restrictions, for the Collecting and paying the same, as by the said acts, by which the said Taxes were assessed, are expressed and directed, until the whole be collected and paid as aforesaid.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the several Courts of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace and Gaol Delivery, and the Courts of Common Pleas for the said County of Lancaster, shall be holden and kept on the first Tuesday in the months of February, May, August and November, in every year, at some proper place within the said County, until a convenient Court House shall be built; and when the same is built and erected in the county aforesaid, the said several Courts shall then be holden and kept at the said Court House on the Days beforementioned: And the Election of Representatives to serve in General Assembly, Assessors and all other officers of the said County, who are or shall be appointed to be annually elected, shall be made and elected at or near the said Court House, at the same time and in the same manner, as by the Charter of Privileges and Laws of the Province of Pennsylvania, is directed to be done in the other Counties of this Province. And it shall be lawful for the Freeman of the said County for the first year, to choose three persons for Commissioners for raising County Rates and Levies for the said County.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful to and for Coleb Pierce, John Wright, Thomas Edwards, and James Mitchell, or any three of them, to purchase and take assurance to them and their Heirs, of a Piece of land, situate in some convenient place in the said County, to be approved by the Governour in Trust and for the use of the said County, and thereon to erect and build, or cause to be erected and built, a Court House and Prison, sufficient to accommodate the Publick Service of the said County, for the Ease and convenience of the Inhabitants.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That for the Defraying the Charges of purchasing the Land, Building and Erecting the Court House and Prison aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for the Commissioners and Assessors of the said County, or a Majority of them, who are hereby required to Assess and Levy so much money as the Trustees, or any three of them, shall judge necessary for purchasing the Land and finishing the said Court House and Prison. Provided always, The sum of money so raised do not exceed Three Hundred Pounds, Current Money of the Province.

"Provided always, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no action or suit now commenced and depending in the county of Chester, against any Person living within the Bounds of the said County of Lancaster, shall be stayed or discontinued by this Act, or by anything herein contained, but the same actions already commenced or depending, may be prosecuted, and Judgment thereupon rendered, as if this act had not been made, and that it shall and may be lawful for the Justices of Chester County to Issue any Judicial Process, to be directed to the Sheriff of Lancaster County, for carrying on and obtaining the Effect of their Suits; which Sheriff shall be obliged to yield obedience in Executing of the said writs, and make due return before the Justices of the Court of the said County of Chester, as if the Parties had been living and residing within the same."

The machinery of the new county was soon in operation, but, as had previously been the case in the old county of Chester, political matters were warm, the contest being between the Scotch-Irish and the Quakers, the latter determined to preserve their supremacy, and having in a great measure the aid of the Germans, especially that portion who were of the Mennonite persuasion. In 1731 the political canvass was violent, the candidates being Andrew Galbraith and John Wright, the former a Scotch-Irishman, the latter an English Quaker. Galbraith was elected, and for several years continued to be returned to the Assembly.

Notwithstanding the previous sales and transfers of land in Pennsylvania, the Five Nations continued to lay claim to the greater portion of the Province east of the Susquehanna and all lands adjoining.

In the summer of 1736 the sachems or chiefs of these nations held a great council at Onondaga, in the Province of New York, and as the old claims had not as yet been adjusted, they resolved that an end should be put to all disputes connected with it. They accordingly appointed their sachems or chiefs with plenary powers to repair to Philadelphia, and there, among other things, settle and adjust all demands and claims connected with the Susquehanna and the adjoining lands. On their arrival at Philadelphia they renewed old treaties of friendship, and on the 11th of October, 1736, made a deed to John Penn, Thomas Penn, and Richard Penn, their heirs, successors, and assigns. The deed was signed by twenty-three Indian chiefs of the Onondaga, Seneca, Oneida, and Tuscarora nations, granted the Penns "all the said river Susquehanna, with the lands lying on both sides thereof, to extend eastward as far as the heads of the branches or springs which run into the said Susquehanna, and all the lands lying on the west side of the said river to the setting of the sun, and to extend from the mouth of the said river northward, up the same to the hills or mountains, called in the language of said nations Tayamentasachta, and by the Delaware Indians the Kekachtannin hills." Thus were the claims of the Indians upon the lands of this part of Pennsylvania relinquished to the Proprietaries, nevertheless surveys had been authorized to be made, and had actually been made west of the Susquehanna prior to 1730 by both the Governor of Maryland and the Governor of Pennsylvania. The last-recited deed comprised all that lay within the limits of the Cumberland Valley and the counties of Adams and York, except that portion north of the Kittochtinny, or Blue Mountain, constituting the northern part of Dauphin and the whole of Perry and Bedford. That portion in Dauphin, north of the Kittochtinny Mountain, was purchased, including a larger tract of county, in 1749.

The deed of Aug. 22, 1749, is as follows:

"We, Canasatego, Sataganachly, Kanalshyacayon, and Canehwadeeroon, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation, called Onontagers, Cayauokee, Kanatsany-Agash Tass, Carachiauaquaqui, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called Snickers. Peter Outachax and Christian Diaryhago, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called the Mobecks; Saria-tagoob, Watshatnon, and Anuchanaxqua, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called the Oneyders; Tawis-Tawis, Kachnoarasasha, and Takachquontas, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called Cayunkers; Tyterox, Balchwanonach-shy, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called the Tuscorrow; Iachnechdoras, Sagokukhiathon, and Achnoarakack-ke, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called the Shomokon Indians; Ntutimus and Quapaghach, sachems or chiefs of the Indian nation called the Delawares; and Bachinosas, sachem or chief of the Indian nation called the Shawanese, in consideration of $500, grant, sell, &c., all that tract or parcel of land lying and being within the following limits and bounds, and thus described: Beginning at the hills or mountain called in the language of the Five Nation Indians Tyanntascha, or Endless Hills, and by the Delaware Indians Katakany Hills, on the east side of the river Susquehanna, being in the northwest line or boundary of the tract of land formerly purchased by the said proprietaries from the said Indian nations, by their deed of the 11th of October, 1736; and from thence running up the said river by the several courses thereof to the first of the nearest mountains to the north side or mouth of the creek, called in the language of the said Five Nation Indians Cantagag, and in the language of the Delaware Indians Mshonfoy, and from thence extending by a direct or straight line to be run from the said mountain on the north side of said creek to the main branch of Delaware River at the north side of the creek Lechawachasin, and from thence across Lechawachasin creek aforesaid down the river Delaware by the several courses thereof to the Kekachuty Hills aforesaid, and from thence by the range of said hills to the place of beginning, as more fully appears by a map annexed; and also all the parts of the river Susquehanna and Delaware from shore to shore which are opposite said lands, and all the Islands in said rivers, &c.*

The death of Thomas Lindley, in 1743, who had served in the Assembly for several years, gave rise to another political commotion in Lancaster County. The same year an election was held to fill the vacancy, and the contest was exceedingly bitter. The Scotch-Irish compelled the sheriff to receive such tickets as they approved, and make a return accordingly. This was not what the Quakers, or those in their interests, were willing to permit. That was a right they reserved to themselves. They were not willing to allow the privilege of free suffrage to the former. The Assembly investigated the subject, and resolutions were adopted by that body as follows:

"Resolved, That the sheriff having assumed upon himself the power of being sole judge at the late election, exclusive of the inspectors chosen by the farmers of the said county of Lancaster, is illegal, unwarrantable, and an infringement of the liberties of the people of the Province; that it gave just cause for discontentment to the inhabitants of said county; and that if any disturbances followed thereupon, it is justly imputed to his own misconduct.

"Resolved, That the sheriff of Lancaster County be admonished by the speaker."

The sheriff attended, and being admonished, promised that he "would take care and keep the law in future." He thereupon altered the returns to suit the political managers at that time, allowing Samuel Blunston to take his seat. It was an unwarranted assumption of power, and the poor frontiersmen were thus outrageously deprived of their proper representation.

The Germans about this time began to look to their rights as well as their interests, and they determined to maintain these with firmness. The influence of their Scotch-Irish neighbors was beginning to be felt, and as a consequence feared by the Assembly. The other class of Germans who were allied to the Quakers were not in sympathy with the Lutheran, Reformed, and Roman Catholic Germans. Hence troubles arose and serious disturbance at the polls. Of course, it was the "turbulent Irish" of the New England historians, and the Proprietaries, to settle the matter, or rather to take sides with the political demagogues who controlled the law-making power of the Provincial government, directed, after the organization of the counties of York and Cumberland, "that their agents should sell no more lands in York and Lancaster counties to the [Scotch]-Irish, and to make advantageous overtures to the [Scotch]-Irish settlers in Paxtang, Swatara, and Donegal townships to induce them to remove to Cumberland County." The offer was an exceedingly liberal one, and some few accepted it where it was to their advantage, but that hardy and determined race were not to be so easily swerved from their duty. They remained, save those who desired to follow the fortunes and footsteps of their friends westward of the Susquehanna. As events subsequently proved, it is well they did not accept the spider's invitation to the fly.

By direction of the Provincial Government a road or highway was laid out in 1733 from the Schuylkill River through Chester County to the town of Lancaster. "At a Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, held at Lancaster for the county of Lancaster the first day of May, in the twelfth year of his Majesty's Reign, Anno Dom. 1739, before John Wright, Tobias Hendricks, Thomas Edwards, Samuel Jones, Andrew Galbreath, Edward Smout, Thomas Lindley, Anthony Shaw, Samuel Boyd, James Armstrong, and Emanuel Carpenter, Esqrs., justices of our Lord the King, the peace of our said Lord the King in the county aforesaid to keep as also divers Felonies, Trespasses, and other Misdeeds in the said County committed to hear & Determine assigned;" and then and there the following order was made:

Some time in the year 1744, John Armstrong, a trader among the Indians residing on the Susquehanna above Peter's Mountain, on the east side of the river, with two of his servants or men, namely James Smith and Woodworth Arnold, was murdered by an Indian of the Delaware tribe named Musemeelin, on the Juniata River. Seven white men and five Indians went in search of the bodies of those murdered; after some search found and buried them. The murderer was afterwards apprehended, and delivered up by his own nation, and imprisoned at Lancaster, whence he was removed to Philadelphia, lest he should escape, or his trial and execution produce an unfavorable impression on his countrymen about to assemble for a conference with the whites at Lancaster. The Governor directed or required that the property of Armstrong should be returned to his family. He also invited a deputation to attend the trial of Musemeelin, and his execution, if found guilty. The following deposition of the men who went in search of the remains of the murdered, was certified to before James Armstrong, one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the County of Lancaster, dated at Paxtang, 19th day of April, 1744:

"The deposition of the subscribers testifieth and saith, that the subscribers having a suspicion that John Armstrong, trader, together with two men, James Smith and Woodworth Arnold, were murdered by the Indians. They met at the house of Joseph Chambers, in Paxtang, and there consulted to go to Shamokin, to consult with the Delaware King and Shickelamy, and there council what they should do concerning the affair, whereupon the King and Council ordered eight of their men to go with the deponents to the house of James Berry, in order to go in quest of the murdered persons, but that night they came to the said Berry's house, three of the eight Indians ran away, and the next morning these deponents, with the five Indians that remained, set out on their journey peaceably to the last appointed sleeping-place of the deceased, and upon their arrival these deponents dispersed themselves in order to find out the corpse of the deceased, and one of the deponents named James Berry, a small distance from the aforesaid sleeping-place, came to a white-oak-tree, which had three notches on it, and close by said tree he found a shoulder-bone, which the deponent does suppose to be John Armstrong's, and that he himself was eating by the Indians, which he carried to the aforesaid sleeping-place, and showed it to his companions, one of whom handed it to the said five Indians to know what bone it was, and they, after passing different sentiments upon it, handed it to a Delaware Indian who was suspected by the deponents, and they testify and say that as soon as the Indian took the bone in his hand, his nose gushed out with blood, and directly handed it to another. From whence these deponents steered along a path about three or four miles to the Narrows of Juniata, where they suspected the murder to have been committed, and where the Allegheny road crosses the creek, these deponents sat down, in order to consult on what measures to take in order to proceed on a discovery.

"Whereupon most of the white men, these deponents, crossed the creek again, and went down the creek, and crossed into an island, where these deponents had intelligence the corpse had been thrown; and there they met the rest of the white men and Indians, who were in company, and there consulted to go further down the creek in quest of the corpse, and these deponents further say, they ordered the Indians to go down the creek on the other side; but they all followed these deponents at a small distance, except one Indian who crossed the creek again; and soon after these deponents seeing some Bald eagles and other fowls, suspected the corpse to be thereabouts; and then lost sight of the Indians, and immediately found one of the corpse, which these deponents say was the corpse of James Smith, one of said Armstrong's men; and directly upon finding the corpse these deponents heard three shots of guns, which they had great reason to think were the Indians, their companions, who had deserted from them; and in order to let them know that they had found the corpse these deponents fired three guns, but to no purpose, for they never saw the Indians any more. And about a quarter of a mile further down the creek, they saw more Bald eagles, whereupon they made down towards the place, where they found another corpse (being the corpse of Woodworth Arnold, the other servant of said Armstrong) lying on a rock, and then went to the former sleeping-place, where they had appointed to meet the Indians, but saw no Indians, only that the Indians had been there and cooked some victuals for themselves, and had gone off.

"And that night, the deponents further say, they had great reason to suspect that the Indians were then thereabouts, and intended to do them some damage; for a dog these deponents had with them barked that night, which was remarkable, for the said dog had not barked all the time they were out till that night, nor ever since, which occasioned these deponents to stand upon their guard behind the trees, with their guns cocked that night. Next morning these deponents went back to the corpses, which they found to be barbarously and ignominiously murdered by very gashed, deep cuts on their hands with a tomahawk or such like weapon, which had sunk into their skulls and brains; and in one of the corpses there appeared a hole in his skull near the cut, which was supposed to be with a tomahawk, which hole, these deponents do believe to be a bullet-hole. And these deponents, after taking a particular view of the corpses, as their melancholy condition would admit, they buried them as decently as their circumstances would allow, and returned home to Paxtang, the Allegheny road to John Harris, thinking it dangerous to return the same way they went out. And further these deponents say not.

The first signer was a brother of the murdered man, and resided on the river above Armstrong's Creek. He addressed a letter to Allummapees,¹ king

On July 4th, Allummapees and other Indians arrived in Philadelphia, and on the 5th called the attention of the Council to the settlement of the Palatines on the Tulpehocke lands, which Allummapees asserted were not included in the deed made on the 18th of September, 1718. On investigation it appeared that the settlements were made by permission of the late Governor, Sir William Keith; but by the advice of James of the Delawares, then at Shamokin, touching the death of his brother and some threats made by some Delaware Indians upon his life :

Logan the Indians consented to wait till such time as the matter could be adjusted.

On the 10th of the following October Allummapees and other chiefs arrived in Philadelphia and spent two days in friendly council.

Aug. 4, 1731, Governor Gordon delivered a written message to the Council, in which he said "that such frequent complaints of late had been made of the abuses committed by carrying large quantities of rum amongst the Indians, that it would be necessary for the Legislature to take the same into their consideration and to provide a remedy so great an evil; that to this pernicious liquor a late unhappy accident in the chief family of our Delaware Indians had been in a great measure owing, viz: the death of Shackatawlin, whom Sassoonan, his uncle, had in a fit of drunkenness killed."

On the 20th of August, 1736, Allummapees and twenty-four other Indians came to Philadelphia. He said "they were not come on any particular business, or to treat about anything of importance, but only to pay a friendly visit." It appeared in the course of the interview that Allummapees was then an old man.

On the 3d of October, 1738, Allummapees, "with divers of their ancient men," and other old and young Indians, came to Philadelphia to visit Governor Thomas Penn. Being called into the Council, he, in behalf of himself and his people said, "That when he was at his own house, he heard his brother, the Governor, was arrived in this country, and thereupon he resolved to come to Philadelphia to visit him, and that now he was glad to see him. His brother, the Proprietor, had told him he should come once a year to visit him, and that he was come on hearing of the Governor's arrival and was glad to see him in good health." He then presented three bundles of deer skins, which he said were a trifle and of little value, but he had no more, and desired the Governor to accept them to make him gloves. The next day the Governor presented Allummapees "a match-coat, laced with silver, and a silver-laced hat."

On the 1st of August, 1740, Allummapees, with sundry Delaware and Mingo Indians, held a council with the government in the Quaker meeting-house in Philadelphia. Allummapees in his address said, "I tell you we came from Allegheny, a long way off." And again he said, "Your young men have killed so many deer, beavers, bears, and game of all sorts, that we can hardly find any for ourselves; therefore, we desire that your people would abstain from hunting, that we may have the benefit of it to support ourselves, for God has made us hunters, and the white people have other ways of living without that. I have brought down my gun and my ax broken as we have no smith living among us and I hope you will get them mended for me. Brother Thomas Penn and Governor, we have brought you one hundred good buckskins, and not one doekin among them. Brethren, I have said a great deal; I am now grown old, so that I could hardly come down to you for want of a horse, and I have been sometimes obliged to borrow one."

Although Allummapees' name appears as present on the 9th and 12th of July, 1742, at the treaty held in Philadelphia, there is no evidence of his taking any part in the business, and this appears to have been his last visit to Philadelphia.

In the spring of 1743, Allummapees being unable to travel, sent a message to the Governor by Szechsidowa, who delivered it on the 22d of April. At the period of the murder of Armstrong, information was sent to Council that Allummapees was ill.

June the 4th, 1745, Bishop Spangenberg wrote: "We also visited Allummapees, the hereditary King of the Indians. His sister's sons are either dead or worthless, hence it is not known on whom the Kingdom will descend. He is very old, almost blind, and very poor; but wital has still power over and is beloved by his people, and is a friend of the English."

A year later Conrad Weiser writes: "Allummapees has no successor of his relatives, and will hear of none as long as he lives;" and on Sep. 27, 1747, he writes from Tulpehocken: "I understand that Allummapees is dead; I cannot say I am sure of it;" and October 15th he writes: "Allummapees is dead."

Notwithstanding these statements in regard to his having no successor, he had a great-grandson three years of age when he died. John Montour's mother, the first wife of Andrew Montour, was a grand-daughter of Allummapees. The evidence of this is as follows: "On the 20th [of April, 1756,] the Indians had a long conference with the Gov-

"PANTANG, 25th April, 1744.

"To Allummapees, King of the Delawares: Great Sir, as a parcel of our men have murdered my brother and two of his men, I wrote you, knowing you to be a King of Justice, that you will send us in all the murderers and the men that were with them. As I looked for the corpse of my murdered brother; for that reason your men threaten my life, and I cannot live in my house. Now, as we have no inclination or mind to go to war with you, our friends, as a friend I desire that you will keep your men from doing me harm, and also to send the murderers and their companions.

"I expect an answer; and am your much hurt friend and brother,

"ALEXANDER ARMSTRONG."

The atrocity of this murder was so aggravating that a Provincial Council was held, and it was resolved that Conrad Weiser, the Provincial interpreter and Indian agent, should be sent to Shamokin to make demands in the name of the Governor for some others concerned in the murder. The following extracts give a detailed account of all the circumstances:

"At a council held April 25, 1744, The Governor, George Thomas, laid before the Board a letter dated April 22, 1744, from Mr. Cookson, at Lancaster, purporting that John Armstrong, an Indian trader, with his two servants, Woodworth Arnold and James Smith, had been murdered at Jantata by three Delaware Indians, and that John Museneelin and Johnson, of Neshalleany, two of the Indians concerned in the murder, had been seized by the order of Shickelamy and the other Indian chiefs at Shamokin and sent under a guard of Indians to be delivered up to justice; that one was actually delivered up in jail at Lancaster, but the other had made his escape from the persons to whose care he was committed.

"His honor then sent to the Chief Justice to consult him about the steps proper to be taken to bring the Indian to his trial, but as he was absent at a Court of Oyer and Terminer in Bucks county, it was the opinion of the Board that the Indian, Museneelin, should be immediately removed to Philadelphia jail, and that Conrad Weiser should be immediately dispatched to the chiefs of the Delaware Indians at Shamokin to make a peremptory demand in his honor's name of the other murderers concerned, and that Shickelamy and the other Indians there do order immediate search to be made for the goods of which the deceased was robbed, in order to their being put into the hands of his brother for the satisfaction of his creditors or the support of his family. And at the same time to inform them that the chiefs of the Indians which shall meet at Lancaster on the treaty with our neighboring governments will be desired to depute some of their number to be present at the trial and at the execution of such as shall be found guilty."

Conrad Weiser was accordingly sent to Shamokin. He writes in his journal, Shamokin, May 2, 1744:

"This day I delivered the Governor's message to Allummapees the Delaware chief, and the rest of Delaware Indians in the presence of Shickelamy and a few more of the Six Nations. The purport of which was, that I was sent express by the Governor and Council to demand those that had been concerned with Museneelin in murdering John Armstrong, Woodworth Arnold, and James Smith; that their bodies might be searched for, and decently buried; that the goods be likewise found and restored without fraud. It was delivered them by me in the Mohawk language, and interpreted into Delaware by Andrew, Madame Montour's son."

In the afternoon Allummapees, in the presence of the aforesaid Indians, made the following answers:

error. They put Andrew Montour's children under his care, as well the three that are to be here independent of the mother as a boy of twelve years old, that he had by a former wife, a Delaware, a grand-daughter of Allummapees."—Col. Rec., vii. 95. This John Montour held a captain's commission in the Revolutionary war, and served with credit in the West under Col. Daniel Brodhead. He must not be confounded with John Montour, the son of Queen Catharina, who adhered to the Crown.

"Brother, the Governor: It is true that we, the Delaware Indians, by the instigation of the evil spirit, have murdered Jas. Armstrong and his men; we have transgressed, and we are ashamed to look up. We have taken the murderer and delivered him to the relations of the deceased, to be dealt with according to his works.

"Brother, the Governor: Your demand for the guard is very just; we have gathered some of them; we will do the utmost of what we can to find them all. We do not doubt but we can find out the most part, and whatever is wanting, we will make up with skins, which is what the guard are sent for to the woods.

"Brother, the Governor: The dead bodies are buried. It is certain that John Armstrong was buried by the murderer, and the other two by those that searched for them. Our hearts are in mourning, and we are in a dismal condition, and cannot say anything at present."

Then Shickelamy with the rest of the Indians of the Six Nations then present said: "Brother, the Governor—We have been all misinformed on both sides about the unhappy accident. Musemeelin has certainly murdered the three white men himself, and upon his bare accusation of Neshaleeny's son, which was nothing but spite, the said Neshaleeny's son was seized, and made a prisoner. Our cousins, the Delaware Indians, being then drunk, in particular Allunoppies, never examined things, but made an innocent person prisoner, which gave a great deal of disturbance amongst us. However the two prisoners were sent, and by the way in going down the river they stopped at the house of James Berry; James told the young man, 'I am sorry to see you in such a condition, I have known you from a boy, and always loved you.' Then the young man seemed to be very much struck to the heart, and said, 'I have said nothing yet, but I will tell all, let all the Indians come up, and the white people also, they shall hear it.' And then told Musemeelin in the presence of the people: 'Now I am going to die for your wickedness; you have killed all the three white men. I never did intend to kill any of them.' The Musemeelin in anger said: 'It is true, I have killed them; I am a man, you are a coward; it is a great satisfaction to me to have killed them; I will die with joy for having killed a great rogue and his companions.' Upon which the young man was set at liberty by the Indians.

"We desire therefore our brother, the Governor, will not insist to have either of the two young men in prison or condemned to die: it is not with Indians as with white people, to put people in prison on suspicion or trifles. Indians must first be found guilty of a crime, then judgment is given and immediately executed. We will give you faithfully all the particulars; and at the ensuing treaty entirely satisfy you; in the mean time, we desire that good friendship and harmony continue; and that we may live long together, is the hearty desire of your brethren, the Indians of the United Six Nations present at Shanokin."

The following is what Shickelamy declared to be the truth of the story concerning the murder of John Armstrong, Woodworth Arnold, and James Smith from the beginning to the end, to wit:

"That Musemeelin owing some skins to John Armstrong, the said Armstrong seized a horse of the said Musemeelin and a rifled gun; the gun was taken by James Smith, deceased. Some time last winter Musemeelin met Armstrong on the river Juniata, and paid all but twenty shillings, for which he offered a neck-belt in pawn to Armstrong and demanded his horse, and James Armstrong refused it and would not deliver up the horse but enlarged the debt, as his usual custom was, and after some quarrel the Indian went away in great anger without his horse to his hunting cabin. Some time after this, Armstrong with his two companions in their way to Ohio passed by the said Musemeelin's hunting cabin, his wife only being at home demanded the horse of Armstrong because he was her proper goods, but did not get him. Armstrong had by this time sold or lent the horse to James Berry; after Musemeelin came from hunting his wife told him that Armstrong was gone by, and that she had demanded the horse of him but did not get him—and as is thought pressed him to pursue and take revenge of Armstrong. The third day in the morning after James Armstrong was gone by, Musemeelin said to the two young men that hunted with him come let us go towards the Great Hill to hunt bears; accordingly they went all three in company; after they had gone a good way Musemeelin who was foremost was told by the two young men that they were out of their course. Come you along said Musemeelin, and they accordingly followed him till they came to the path that leads to the Ohio. Then Musemeelin told them he had a good mind to go and fetch his horse back from Armstrong, and desired the two young men to come along; accordingly they went. It was then almost night, and they travelled till next morning Musemeelin said, now they are not far off. We will make ourselves black, then they will be frightened and will deliver up the horse immediately, and I will tell Jack that if he don't give me the horse I will kill him, and when he said so he laughed. The young men thought he joked as he used to do. They did not blacken themselves but he did. When the sun was above the trees, or about an hour high, they all came to the fire where they found James Smith sitting, and they also sat down. Musemeelin asked whether Jack was? Smith told him that he was gone to clear the road a little. Musemeelin said he wanted to speak with him, and went that way, and after he had gone a little distance from the fire he said something and looked back laughing, but he having a thick throat and his speech being very bad, and their talking with Smith hindered them from understanding what he said they did not mind it. They being hungry, Smith told them to kill some turtles, of which there were plenty, and we would make some bread, and by and by they would all eat together. While they were talking they heard a gun go off far off, at which time Woodworth Arnold was killed as they learned afterwards.

"Soon after Musemeelin came back and said, why did you not kill that white man according as I bid you, I have laid the other two down? At this they were surprised, and one of the young men, commonly called Jimmy, ran away to the riverside. Musemeelin said to the other how will you do to kill Catawba, if you cannot kill white men? You towards, I'll show you how you must do! and then taking up the English axe that lay there, he struck it three times into Smith's head before he died. Smith never stirred. Then he told the young Indian to call the other; but he was so terrified he could not call. Musemeelin then went and fetched him, and said to him that two of the white men were killed, he must go now and kill the third, then each of them would have killed one. But neither of them dare venture to talk anything about it. Then he pressed them to go along with him—he went foremost; then one of the young men told the other as they went along, my friend, don't you kill any of the white people, let him do what he will; I have not killed Smith, he has done it himself; We have no need to do such a barbarous thing. Musemeelin being then a good way before them in a hurry, they soon saw John Armstrong sitting upon an old log. Musemeelin spoke to him and said, Where is my horse? Armstrong made answer and said, He will come by and by; you shall have him. I want him now, said Musemeelin. Armstrong answered, You shall have him. Come, let us go to that fire,—which was at some distance from the place where Armstrong sat,—and let us talk and smoke together. Go along, then, said Musemeelin. I am coming, said Armstrong, do you go before; Musemeelin, do you go foremost. Armstrong looked then like a dead man, and went towards the fire and was immediately shot in his back by Musemeelin and fell. Musemeelin then took his hatchet and struck it into Armstrong's head, and said, Give me my horse, I tell you. By this time one of the young men had fled again that had gone away before, but he returned in a short time. Musemeelin then told the young men they must not offer to discover or tell a word about what had been done for their lives, but they must help him to bury Jack, and the other two were to be thrown into the river. After that was done, Musemeelin ordered them to load the horses and follow towards the hill, where they intended to hide the goods; accordingly they did, and as they were going Musemeelin told them that as there were a great many Indians hunting about that place, if they should happen to meet with any, they must be killed to prevent betraying them. As they went along, Musemeelin going before, the two young men agreed to run away as soon as they could meet with any Indians, and not to hurt any body. They came to the desired place, the horses were unloaded, and Musemeelin opened the bundles, and offered the two young men each a parcel of goods. They told him that as they had already sold their skins, and everybody knew they had nothing, they would certainly be charged with a black action, were they to bring any goods to the town, and therefore they would not accept of any, but promised, nevertheless, not to betray him. Now, says Musemeelin, I know what you were talking about when you stayed so far behind.

"The two young men being in great danger of losing their lives—of which they had been much afraid all that day—accepted of what he offered to them, and the rest of the goods they put in a heap and covered them from the rain, and then went to their hunting cabin. Musemeelin unexpectedly finding two or three more Indians there, hid down his goods, and said he had killed Jack Armstrong and taken pay for his horse, and should any of them discover it, that person he would likewise kill; but otherwise they might all take a part of the goods. The young man called Jimmy went away to Shanokin after Musemeelin was gone to bury the goods with three more Indians, with whom he had prevailed; one of them was Neshaleeny's son, whom he had ordered to kill James Smith, but these Indians would not have any of the goods. Some time after the young Indian had been in Shanokin, it was whispered about that some of the Delaware Indians had killed Armstrong and his men. A drunken Indian came to one of the Tadolous houses at night and told the man of the house that he could tell him a piece of bad news. What is that? said the other. The drunken man said, some of our Delaware Indians have killed Armstrong and his men, which, if our chiefs should not resent, and take them up, I will kill them myself to prevent a disturbance between us and the white people, our brother. Next morning Shickelamy and some other Indians of the Delawares were called to assist Allumoppies in council. When Shickelamy and Allumoppies got one of the Tadolous Indians to write a letter to me to desire me to come to Shamokin in all haste, that the Indians were much dissatisfied in mind. This letter was brought to my house by four Delaware Indians sent express; but I was then in Philadelphia, and when I came home and found all particulars mentioned in this letter, and that none of the Indians of the Six Nations had been down, I did not care to meddle with Delaware Indian affairs, and stayed at home till I received the Governor's orders to go, which was about two weeks after. Allumoppies was advised by his council to employ a conjurer, or, as they called it, to find out the murderer. Accordingly he did, and the Indians met, the Seer being busy all night, told them in the morning to examine such and such an one, they were present when Armstrong was killed, naming the two young men. Musementin was present. Accordingly Allumoppies, Quittheyquent, and Thomas Green, an Indian, went to him that had fled first and examined him; he told the whole story very freely; then they went to the other, but he would not say a word, but went away and left him. The three Indians returned to Shickelamy and informed them of what discovery they had made, when it was agreed to secure the murderers, and deliver them up to the white people. Then a great noise arose among the Delaware Indians, and some were afraid of their lives, and went into the woods. Not one cared to meddle with Musementin and the other that could not be prevailed on to discover anything, because of the resentment of their families; but they being pressed by Shickelamy's son to secure the murderers, otherwise they would be cut off from the chain of friendship. Four or five of the Delawares made Musementin and the other young man prisoners, and tied them both. They lay twenty-four hours, and none would venture to conduct them down, because of the great division among the Delaware Indians. And Allumoppies, in danger of being killed, fled to Shickelamy and begged his protection. At last Shickelamy's son, Jack, went to the Delawares, most of them being drunk, as they had been for several days, and told them to deliver the prisoners to Alexander Armstrong, and they were afraid to do it. They might separate their heads from their bodies and lay them in the canoe, and carry them to Alexander to roast and eat them, that would satisfy his revenge as he wants to eat Indians. They prevailed with the said Jack to assist them, and accordingly he and his brother and some of the Delawares went with two canoes and carried them off."

Conrad Weiser, in a letter to a friend, dated Heidelberg, 1746, adverts to an interesting incident which occurred at the conclusion of this interview at Shamokin. He says,—

"Two years ago I was sent by the Governor to Shamokin, on account of the nobility death of John Armstrong, the Indian trader (1744). After I had performed my errand, there was a feast prepared, to which the Governor's messengers were invited; there were about one hundred persons present, to whom, after we had in great silence devoured a fat bear, the eldest of the chiefs made a speech, in which he said: 'That by a great misfortune three of the brethren, the white men, had been killed by an Indian; that nevertheless the sun was not set (meaning there was no war), it had only been somewhat darkened by a small cloud, which was now gone away; he that had done evil was like to be punished, and the land remain in peace: therefore, he exhorted his people to thankfulness to God;' and, therefore, he began to sing with an awful solemnity but without expressing any words; the others accompanied him with great earnestness of fervor, spoke these words, 'Thanks, thanks be to thee, thou great Lord of the world, in that thou hast again caused the sun to shine, and hast dispersed the dark cloud; the Indians are thine.'"

From this time on, for a period of ten years, we hear of no Indian outrages. The Indian referred to was not, as should have been done, tried and executed. The murder of Armstrong was an atrocious one, and the offender should have been promptly dealt with.

Like escaped murderers in these days, he was lionized by "certain parties," and subsequently returned to his wigwam, from which in after-years he emanated when some scalping party or bloody fray was inaugurated.

In 1745 that pious Moravian, Bishop Spangenberg, in company with two other members of the mission board of the church, undertook a journey to Onondaga to treat with the Six Nations for permission for the Moravian Indians to remove to Wyoming. From his notes of travel, as his route lay through the northern part of Dauphin County, we make such extracts as may be of local interest. The party set out from Bethlehem on the 24th of May. On the 30th, at Tulpehocken, Conrad Weiser and his two sons joined them. Spangenberg then continues,—". . . After travelling ten miles we came to the Kittatinny Hills,¹ which are high and rocky, and difficult for horses to climb. On reaching the top we came to Pilger Ruh,² where we dismounted and rested. After descending we entered Anton's Wilderness,³ where we pitched our first tents, built a fire, pastured our horses, partook of a light supper, and retired to rest. Our course to-day was northwest.

"May 31st. Arose early, looked up our horses, took a little breakfast, and then continued our journey in the name of God, our Saviour. Brother Meurer and Nicke returned to Tulpehocken with letters to Mary Spangenberg, at Bethlehem. After passing the Great Swatara we climbed the Thurnstein,⁴ a high mountain, rocky and almost impassable for horses. On the high summit we refreshed ourselves at Erdmuth's Spring,⁵ which flows through the valleys until it empties into the Susquehanna. We were four hours in crossing the mountain. At Ludwig's Ruh,⁶ at the foot of the mountain, we nooned. Here Laurel Creek⁷ flows past. After dinner our course was northwest. We passed through Anna's Valley,⁸ beautiful and pleasing to the eyes, which lies in among the hills.

² "Pilgrims' Rest," a plain on the top of the mountain. The passage of the mountain was effected at the Great Swatara Gap, called Tolihoo by the Indians, corrupted into "The Hole."

³ Anthony's Wilderness is noted on Lewis Evans' map of 1749. It included the valley through which runs Stony Creek. It was named for Anthony Seyfert, one of the nine colonists whom Spangenberg led to Georgia in 1735, where the Moravians proposed establishing themselves with a view of commencing missions among the Creeks and Cherokees.

⁴ Peter's Mountain. It has been stated that this name was given to it by Conrad Weiser, in honor of Zinzendorf, when guiding him to Shamokin in 1742. This is certainly a mistake. As early as 1735, Peter Allen was located at the foot of that mountain, near the Susquehanna, and in 1729 it was thus named, and undoubtedly for him.

⁷ A branch of the Mahantango, noted on Lewis Evans' map of 1749.

⁸ Named in honor of Anna Nitschman, who accompanied Zinzendorf to Shamokin in 1742. It is what is now so widely known as Lykens Valley.

At the Double Eagle,¹ on Benigna's Creek,² we passed the night."

After their stay at Onondaga, about ten days, Spangenberg and his party began their return journey on the 29th of June. On the 10th of July they had reached the Double Eagle, on Mahantango Creek. The journal thus concludes:

"... Here we found encamped a family of Indians, who, on learning from whence we had come, said we must be tired, and the man said to his wife, 'Give them some spits full of venison.' In return, Bro. Spangenberg gave them knives and thimbles. Nooned at Benigna's Creek, and at nightfall came to the Thurnstein. As we were leading our horses down, Bro. Spangenberg, who was in advance, heard the rattle of a rattlesnake and called to us to come and kill it, but it could not be found. Encamped at the base of the Thurnstein on the Swatara.

"July 11. Our course was southeast. We early entered 'Anton's Wilderness,' thence over the Kittatinny Mountain, and nooned on the Little Swatara. From thence we proceeded to Christopher Weiser's."

The year 1740 is remarkable in the annals of Pennsylvania for the labors of the celebrated enthusiastic itinerant Whitefield. He landed at Lewistown in November, 1739, and soon after came to Philadelphia. His arrival disturbed the religious harmony which had hitherto prevailed. He drew to himself many followers from all denominations, who, influenced by the energy of his manner, the thunder of his voice, and his flowing eloquence, were ready to subscribe his unnaural and incomprehensible faith, professing their willingness to endure eternal damnation that they might be forever saved. His disciples were chiefly the illiterate and uninformed, who made up in zeal what they lacked in knowledge. Their number seems to have awed the journalists, who would not venture to correct the misstatements of his friends without an apology for interference. Like most reformers, he turned the force of his artillery against the amusements and pleasures of society. He visited the Susquehanna, and remained some time in and about Harris' Ferry, preaching repeatedly to the people, who flocked from all quarters to hear him. Many of the settlers neglected the cultivation of their farms, and their fields were left unsown. Parson Elder, Mr. Harris, and others remonstrated with them on their improvidence, but ineffectually, and the consequences were likely to prove serious, since not a few at the end of the season found themselves in want.

In 1747 there were great fears of an invasion of the frontiers of Pennsylvania by the French and their Indian allies. The inhabitants mustered for their defense, and two associated regiments were formed in Lancaster County, one on the east, the other on the west side of the Susquehanna. Of the regiment organized east of the river, fifteen of the eighteen companies were raised within the present limits of Dauphin and Lebanon Counties. They were in truth "a fighting people," were strong in defense of their rights, and in true loyalty and patriotism were not equaled by any settlement in the colonies of America. The officers were:

In the years 1751 and 1752 the cereal crops were very abundant, as we find by the following from the Chronicon Ephratensis. These years were followed by a season of scarceness from 1753 to 1755, and upon this came the Indian war. The Ephrata Chronicle says,—

“The years 1751 and 1752 have been so fruitful in wheat and other grain that men in wanton carelessness sought to waste the supply; for the precious wheat, which might have supported many poor, they used to fatten hogs which afterwards they consumed in their sumptuousness. Besides, distilleries were erected everywhere, and thus this great blessing was turned into strong drink, which gave rise to much disorder.”

Emigration to Pennsylvania was continually on the increase, and by reference to the early warrantees and such assessment-lists as have come down to us, it will be seen that there was a continual stream of Scotch-Irish settlers, who halted a while among their friends and former neighbors in Paxtang, Hanover, and Derry, from whence they followed the tide of migration into the beautiful and fertile valleys to the southward. Homes—permanent homes—were being built, and the hardy pioneer was beginning to look for his reward from the broad acres which began to delight his eye, and the dreams of years were about to be realized when, like a demon of desolation, came the atrocious border wars from 1754 to 1764.

CHAPTER IV.

The French and Indian War—Petition of the Inhabitants for Protection—Braddock's Expedition—The Atrocities of the Savages—Correspondence of John Harris and others relating to the Frontiers.

THERE were few Indian outrages committed within the limits of Dauphin County prior to 1755. The inhabitants, however, were, owing to several murders on the Potomac in Virginia and on the frontiers of Cumberland County, becoming very uneasy. They had little faith in the friendship of the Indians, and they apprehended war, knowing full well the influence of the French over the savages, and whose devilish propensities needed but little prompting to have them desolate the pioneer homes of Pennsylvania. On the 22d of July, 1754, the following petition was laid before the Governor of the Province:

The humble petition of the inhabitants of the townships of Pextang, Derry, and Hanover, Lancaster Co., humbly sheweth that your petitioners, being settled on and near the river Susquehanna, apprehend themselves in great danger from the French and French Indians, as it is in their power several times in the year to transport themselves, with ammunition, artillery, and every necessary, down the said river; and their conduct of late to the neighboring provinces increases our dread of a speedy visit from them, as we are as near and convenient as the provinces already attacked, and are less capable of defending ourselves, as we are unprovided with arms and ammunition and unable to purchase them. A great number are warm and active in these parts for the defense of themselves and country were they enabled so to do (although not such a number as would be able to withstand the enemy). We, your petitioners, therefore humbly pray that your Honor would take our distressed condition into consideration and make such provision for us as may prevent ourselves and families from being destroyed and ruined by such a cruel enemy; and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Matthew Taylor,

An alarming crisis was at hand. The French, now hovering around the great lakes, sedulously applied themselves to seduce the Indians from their allegiance to the English. The Shawanese had already joined them; the Delawares waited only for an opportunity to revenge their wrongs; and of the Six Nations, the Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas were wavering. To keep the Indians in favor of the Province required much cunning diplomacy and expensive presents. In this alarming juncture the old flame of civil dissension burst out with increased force. The presents to the Indians, with the erection of a line of forts along the frontier, and the maintenance of a military force, drew heavily upon the provincial purse. The Assembly, the popular branch, urged that the Proprietary estates should be taxed, as well as those of humble individuals. The Proprietaries, through their deputies, refused, and pleaded prerogative, charter, and law; the Assembly in turn pleaded equity, common danger, and common benefit, requiring a common expense. The Proprietaries offered bounties in lands yet to be conquered from the Indians, and the privilege of issuing more paper money; the Assembly wanted something more tangible. The Assembly passed laws, laying taxes, and granting supplies, but annexing conditions; the Governors opposed the conditions, but were willing to aid the Assembly in taxing the people, but not the Proprietaries. Here were the germs of revolution, not fully matured until twenty years later. In the mean time the frontiers were left exposed, while these frivolous disputes continued. The pacific principles, too, of the Quakers, and Dunkards, and Mennonites, and Schwenkfelders, came in to complicate the strife; but as the danger increased, they prudently kept aloof from public office, leaving the management of the war to sects less scrupulous. The pulpit and the press were deeply involved in the discussion, and the population was divided into opposing factions upon this question.

In his message to the Assembly in August, 1754, the Governor says, "The people of the upper parts of Lancaster County are so apprehensive of danger at this critical juncture from the nearness of French and savages under their influence, that the principal inhabitants have in the most earnest manner, petitioned me to provide for their protection; representing withal, that a great number would be warm and active in defense of themselves and their country, were they enabled so to be, by being supplied with arms and ammunition, which many of them are unable to purchase at their own private expense. The substance of these several petitions, which I shall likewise order to be laid before you, appears to me, gentlemen, to be of the greatest importance, and well worthy of your most serious attention. You may be assured that nothing which depends on me shall be wanting towards affording them the protection they desire; but you cannot at the same time but be sensible how little it is in my power to answer their expectations without the aid of your house. It becomes then my indispensable duty, and I cannot on any account whatever, excuse myself from pressing you to turn your thoughts on the defenseless state of the Province in general, as well as of our back inhabitants in particular; and to provide such means for the security of the whole, as shall be thought at once both reasonable and effectual to the ends proposed; in which, as in every other matter, consistent with my honor, and the trust reposed in me, I promise you my hearty concurrence."

It soon became known that many of the savages, heretofore "friendly Indians," were disaffected, and favored the French interests in the West, ready to aid them in their schemes. The government of the Provinces of Pennsylvania and Virginia were therefore anxious not only to have the continued friendship of those who still professed to be friendly, but, if possible, to regain the friendship of the disaffected. For that purpose Conrad Weiser was sent, in the month of September, 1754, to Aughwick, where George Croghan, the Indian agent, had quite a number of different tribes under his care. Notwithstanding that Mr. Weiser, as the agent of the government, did all in his power, aided by liberal donations of money, to secure the continued friendly assistance of the Indians, murders were committed by the Indians; and the inhabitants of the frontiers were all in a panic.

At this juncture, the English government became alarmed, and at length determined to put an end to French encroachments, French intrigues, and French-Indian atrocities. Several of the royal regiments were sent to America, in command of whom was Maj.-Gen. Edward Braddock. This army arrived from England early in March, 1755, landing at Alexandria, in Virginia, whence they marched to Fredericktown, in Maryland, preparatory to the contemplated expedition against Fort Duquesne, on the Ohio. The place of debarkation was selected with that ignorance and want of judgment which distinguished the British ministry. That Province could furnish neither provisions nor carriages for the army, while Pennsylvania, rich in grain and well stocked with wagons, could readily supply food and the means to transport the army to any point. The Provincial Assembly, apprehending the general to be prejudiced against them, sent Benjamin Franklin to undeceive him, with instructions, however, not to assume the character of their agent, but to present himself as postmaster-general, disposed to make his office subservient to the general's plans. While Franklin was with the army a return of the wagons obtainable was made, from which it appeared that there were not more than twenty-five, and not all of those serviceable. Braddock was surprised, declared the expedition at an end, and exclaimed against the ministers for having sent them into a country destitute of the means of transportation. On Franklin expressing his regret that the army had not been landed in Pennsylvania, where such means abounded, Braddock eagerly seized on his words, and commissioned him, on liberal terms, to procure one hundred and fifty wagons and fifteen hundred pack-horses. Franklin, on his return, circulated advertisements through the counties of York, Lancaster, and Cumberland, and by an artful address obtained, in two weeks, all the wagons, two hundred and fifty pack-horses, and much popularity for himself. He stated in his address that he found the general incensed at the delay of the horses and carriages he had expected from Philadelphia, and disposed to send an armed force to seize the carriages, horses, and drivers necessary for the service, but that he, apprehending the visit of British soldiers in their present temper would be very inconvenient to the inhabitants, was desirous to try what might be done by fair and equitable means, and that an opportunity was now presented of obtaining thirty thousand pounds in silver and gold, which would supply the deficiency of the Provincial currency. He expended eight hundred pounds received from the general, advanced two hundred pounds himself, and gave his bonds for the payment of the value of such horses as should be lost in the service, the owners refusing to rely upon Braddock's promise, alleging that he was unknown to them. The claims made against him in consequence of this engagement amounted to twenty thousand pounds, and were not settled by the government until after much delay and trouble.¹

Gen. Braddock removed his army to a post on Wills' Creek, since called Fort Cumberland, where he awaited the wagons and other necessary supplies from Pennsylvania. From this place, confident of success, he informed the Governors of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, that, should he take Fort Duquesne in its present condition, he would, after some additions, garrison it, and leave there the guns, ammunition, and stores he should find in it. But, should the enemy abandon and destroy the fortifications, as he apprehended, he would repair the fort, or construct another. In the latter case he required the necessary means of defense to be furnished by the colonies, and to be forwarded immediately, that he might not be delayed in his progress to Forts Niagara and Frontenac; he also gave information of the enemy's intention to attack the frontier settlements as soon as he should have marched beyond them.

On the 8th of June Gen. Braddock left Fort Cumberland. Scarooyadi, successor to the Half-King of the Senecas, and Monacatotha, whose acquaintance Washington had made on the Ohio on his mission to Le Beuf, with about one hundred and fifty Indians, Senecas and Delawares, accompanied him. George Croghan, the Indian agent of Pennsylvania, and a frontiersman of great value called the "Wild Hunter" or Captain Jack, were also with him. The first brigade, under Sir Peter Halkett, led the way, and the 9th the main body followed. From that date until the 7th of July following the army had only reached the eastern branch of Bushy Run, called Turtle Creek, and the place of encampment was a short distance northerly of the present village of Stewartsville, Westmoreland Co. It was Gen. Braddock's intention to cross Turtle Creek, and approach Fort Duquesne on the other side; but the banks were so precipitous, and presented such obstacles to crossing with his artillery and heavy baggage, that he hesitated, and Sir John St. Clair went out with a party to reconnoitre. On his return, before night, he reported that he had found the ridge which led to Fort Duquesne, but that considerable work would be necessary to prepare a road for crossing Turtle Creek. This route was finally abandoned, and on the 8th the army marched eight miles, and encamped not far from the Monongahela, west of the Yonghiogheny, and near what is called, on Senl's map, "Sugar Run." When Braddock reached this place, it was his design to pass through the narrows, but he was informed by the guide, who had been sent out to explore, that the passage was very difficult, about two miles in length, with a river on the left, and a high mountain on the right, and that much work must be done to make it passable for carriages. At the same time he was told that there were two good fords across the Monongahela, where the water was shallow, and the banks not steep. With these views of the case he determined to cross the ford the next morning. The order of march was given out, and all the arrangements were made for an early movement.

About eight o'clock on the morning of the 9th the advanced division, under Col. Gage, crossed the ford and pushed forward. After the whole army had crossed and marched about a mile, Braddock received a note from Col. Gage giving notice that he had passed the second ford without difficulty. A little before two o'clock the whole army had crossed this ford, and was arranged in the order of march on the river plateau. Col. Gage, with the advanced party, was then ordered to march, and while the main body was yet standing on the plain, the action began near the river. Not a single man of the enemy had before been seen. To the brave grenadiers who had stood firm on the plains of Europe, amid tempests of cannon-balls cutting down whole platoons of their comrades, this new species of warfare was perfectly appalling, and unable longer to breast the girdle of fire which enveloped them, they gave way in confusion, involving the whole army in distress, dismay, and disorder. In such a dilemma, with hundreds of his men falling at every discharge, his ranks converted into a wild and reckless multitude, unable to rally and too proud to retreat, Braddock obstinately refused to allow the Provincial troops to fight the Indians in their own way, but with a madness incomprehensible did his utmost to form the men into platoons and wheel them into close columns. The result was horrible, and the sacrifice of life without a parallel at that time in Indian warfare. The Provincial regiments, unable to keep together, spread through the surrounding woods, and by this means did all the execution that was effected. Every man fought for himself, and rushing to the trees from behind which gleamed the flash of the rifle, the brave frontiersmen often hayoneted the savage at his post. This perilous enterprise, however, was attended with a terrible sacrifice. Out of three full companies of Virginia troops but thirty men were left; of the Pennsylvania forces, much less.

It was the most disastrous defeat ever sustained by any European army in America. Sixty-three officers and seven hundred and fourteen privates were killed or dangerously wounded. There is, perhaps, no instance upon record where so great a proportion of officers were killed. Out of the eighty-six composing the command but twenty-three escaped unhurt. Their brilliant uniform seemed sure marks for the deadly aim of the savage. On that disastrous day the military genius of Washington shone forth with much of that splendor which afterwards made him so illustrious. His courage, energy, bravery, and skill displayed on this occasion marked him as possessed of the highest order of military talents. After the fall of Braddock, with his Provincial troops he covered the retreat, and saved the remnant of the army from annihilation.

Gen. Braddock was taken to Dunbar's Camp, on the summit of Laurel Hill, where he breathed his last, on the fourth day after the battle. His body was interred in the centre of the road, and the entire army marched over the spot in order that the remains of the unfortunate general might not be desecrated by savage hands.

In the correspondence of Gen. Braddock with his government, from the time of his arrival in Virginia to his defeat, he complains that Pennsylvania and Virginia would not give the aid he demanded. The disputes at that period in the Proprietary government, says Duponceau, account in some degree, but not sufficiently, for these results. The Quaker spirit in Pennsylvania may be supposed to have produced them, but it was used as a means instead of a primary cause. It is certain that at that time a leading Quaker, who was Speaker of the Assembly, said in debate, "I had rather see Philadelphia sacked three times by the French than vote a single copper for the war." It is easy to see from this the difficulties Braddock had to contend with. Had he received the earnest support of the Province his success would have been assured. The Scotch-Irish, who settled on the frontiers, were busy protecting their own homes, and although several companies offered their services to Gen. Braddock he did not accept them,—not from the motives ascribed to him by most historians, but from the fact that they were actually required at their own firesides, which had already been invaded by the savage foe.

The consternation at Braddock's defeat was very great in Pennsylvania. The retreat of Dunbar left the whole frontier uncovered, while the inhabitants, unarmed and undisciplined, were compelled hastily to seek the means of defense or of flight. In describing the exposed state of the Province, and the miseries which threatened it, the Governor had occasion to be entirely satisfied with his own eloquence, and had his resolution to defend it equaled the earnestness of his appeal to the Assembly, the people might have been spared much suffering. The enemy, long restrained by fear of another attack, and scarce crediting his senses when he discovered the defenseless state of the frontiers, now roamed unmolested and fearlessly along the western lines of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, committing the most appalling outrages and wanton cruelties which the cupidity and ferocity of the savage could dictate. The first inroads into Pennsylvania were into Cumberland County, whence they were soon extended to the Susquehanna. The inhabitants, dwelling at the distance of from one to three miles apart, fell unresistingly, were captured, or fled in terror to the interior settlements. The main body of the enemy encamped on the Susquehanna, thirty miles above Harris' Ferry, whence they extended themselves on both sides the river below the Kittochtinny Mountains. The settlements at the Great Cove, in Cumberland County, now Fulton, were destroyed, and many of the inhabitants slaughtered or made captives, and the same fate fell upon Tulpehocken, upon Mahanoy, and Guadenhütten.

Under date of October 29th, John Harris wrote to the Governor: "We expect the enemy upon us every day, and the inhabitants are abandoning their plantations, being greatly discouraged at the approach of such a number of cruel savages, and no sign of assistance. The Indians are cutting us off every day, and I had a certain account of about fifteen hundred Indians, besides French, being on their march against us and Virginia, and now close on our borders, their scouts scalping our families on our frontiers daily. Andrew Montour and others at Shamokin desired me to take care; that there was forty Indians out many days, and intended to burn my house and destroy myself and family. I have this day cut holes in my house, and am determined to hold out to the last extremity if I can get some men to stand by me, few of which I yet can at present, every one being in fear of their own families being cut off every hour (such is our situation). I am informed that a French officer was expected at Shamokin this week with a party of Delawares and Shawanese, no doubt to take possession of our river; and, as to the state of the Susquehanna Indians, a great part of them are actually in the French interest; but if we should raise a number of men immediately as will be able to take possession of some convenient place up Susquehanna, and build a strong fort in spite of French or Indians, perhaps some Indians may join us, but it is trusting to uncertainly to depend upon them in my opinion. We ought to insist on the Indians declaring either for or against us. As soon as we are prepared for them we must bid up for scalps and keep the woods full of our people hunting them, or they will ruin our Province, for they are a dreadful enemy. We impatiently look for assistance. I have sent out two Indian spies to Shamokin, they are Mohawks, and I expect they will return in a day or two. Consider our situation, and rouse your people downwards, and not let about fifteen hundred villains distress such a number of inhabitants as is in Pennsylvania, which actually they will if they possess our provisions and frontiers long, as they now have many thousands of bushels of our corn and wheat in possession already, for the inhabitants go off and leaves all."

In consequence of these melancholy tidings the Governor summoned the Assembly for the 3d of November, when he laid before them an account of the proceedings of the enemy, and demanded money and a militia law. Petitions were poured in from all parts of the Province,—from the frontier counties, praying for arms and munitions; from the middle counties, deprecating further resistance to the views of the Governor, and requiring, if it were necessary, a partial sacrifice of the property of the citizens for the defense of their lives; and that the religious scruples of the members of the Assembly might no longer prevent the defense of the country.

By the middle of the month the savages had "entered the passes of the Blue Mountains, broke into the counties of Lancaster, Berks, and Northampton, committing murder, devastations, and other kind of horrid mischief," to use the language of Governor Morris, and yet the Assembly delayed the measures of defense required of them. The Governor, astonished at the obstinacy of the Assembly, for such he characterized it, again sent a message requesting that body to strengthen his hands and afford assistance to the back inhabitants, but they plead in excuse that they feared the alienating the affections of the Indians, and in a measure refused to grant the means necessary for the protection of the frontiers.

The cold indifference of the Assembly at such a crisis awoke the deepest indignation throughout the Province. Public meetings were held in various parts of Lancaster and in the frontier counties, at which it was resolved that they would "repair to Philadelphia and compel the Provincial authorities to pass proper laws to defend the country and oppose the enemy." In addition, the dead bodies of some of the murdered and mangled were sent to that city and hauled about the streets, with placards announcing that these were victims of the Quaker policy of non-resistance. A large and threatening mob surrounded the House of Assembly, placed the dead bodies in the doorway, and demanded immediate relief for the people of the frontiers. Such, indeed, were the desperate measures resorted to for self-defense. There was little sympathy by the members of that body, whose phlegmatic temperament could allow them to look calmly upon the victims of their neglect. In preventing protection, as was their sworn duty to do, they were indirectly guilty of the complete sway of the tomahawk and scalping-knife.

Following Braddock's defeat, the French, or rather their Indian allies, encouraged by their success, pushed their incursions into the interior parts of the frontier settlements, into York, Cumberland, Lancaster, Berks, and Northampton Counties. These counties were scenes of murder and rapine for about ten years. The apprehensions of those who feared the direful consequences of the English defeat were sadly realized.

Plans were now devised for the defense of the frontiers. A chain of forts were directed to be erected, but it was not until the succeeding summer that anything like places of defense were actually built. The sad condition of affairs in the interior and western part of the Province is thus described by Governor Robert Morris in his message of July 24, 1755, to the Assembly in relation to Braddock's defeat: "This unfortunate and unexpected change in our affairs deeply affects every one of His Majesty's colonies, but none of them in so sensible a manner as this Province; while having no militia is thereby left exposed to the cruel incursion of the French and barbarous Indians, who delight in shedding human blood, and who make no distinction as to age or sex,—as to those that are armed against them, or such as they can surprise in their peaceful habitations, all are alike the objects of their cruelty.—slaughtering the tender infant and frightened mother with equal joy and fierceness. To such enemies, spurred by the native cruelty of their tempers, encouraged by their late success, and having now no army to fear, are the inhabitants of this Province exposed, and by such must we now expect to be overrun if we do not immediately prepare for our own defense; nor ought we to content ourselves with this, but resolve to drive to and confine the French to their own just limits."

Scarce three months after this disastrous defeat we find the barbarous savages engaged in murdering the whites and setting fire to their houses on the west side of Susquehanna, in Cumberland County, now Union, for on the 15th of October, 1755, a party of Indians "fell upon the inhabitants on Mahanoy (or Penn's) Creek that runs into the river Susquehanna, about five miles lower than the Great Fork made by the juncture of the two main branches of the Susquehanna, killed and carried off about twenty-five persons, and burnt and destroyed their buildings and improvements, and the whole settlement was deserted." Learning of these transactions, John Harris wrote to the Governor, as follows:

"May it please your Honor,—

"I was informed last night by a person that came down our river that there was a Dutch (German) woman, who made her escape to

"PAXTANG, Oct. 20, 1755.

George Gabriel's, and informs us that last Friday evening, on her way home from this settlement, on Mahahony or Penn's Creek, where her family lived, she called at a neighbor's house and saw two persons lying by the door of said house murdered and scalped, and there were some Dutch (German) families that lived near their places immediately left, not thinking it safe to stay any longer. It is the opinion of the people up the river, that the families on Penn's Creek being scattered, that but few in number are killed or carried off, except the above said woman, the certainty of which will soon be known, as there are some men gone out to bury the dead.

"By report this evening I was likewise informed by the belt of wampum, and these Indians here, there were seen near Shamokin, about six days ago, two French Indians of the Canawago tribe. I a little doubted the truth of the report at first, but the Indians have seemed so afraid that they dispatched messengers immediately to the mountains above my house to bring in some of their women that were gathering chestnuts, for fear of their being killed.

"By a person just arrived down our river, brought information of two men being murdered within five miles of George Gabriel's, four women carried off, and there is one man wounded in three places who escaped to Gabriel's, and it is imagined that all the inhabitants on Penn's Creek and Little Mahahony are killed or carried off, as most of them live much higher up, where the first murder was discovered. The Indian warriors here send you these two strings of white wampum, and the women the black one, both requesting that you would lay by all your council pipes immediately, and open all your eyes and ears, and help your slain people in the land, and to put a stop to it immediately, and come to this place to our assistance without any delay; and the belt of wampum particularly mentions that the proprietors and your Honor would immediately act in defense of their country, as the old chain of friendship now is broken by several nations of Indians, and it seems to be such as they never expected to see or hear of. Any delay on our acting vigorously now at this time would be the loss of all Indian interest, and perhaps our ruin in these parts.

"I am your honor's most obedient servant,

"JOHN HARRIS.

"P.S.—I shall endeavor to get a number of my neighbors to go out as far as the murder has been committed, and perhaps to Shamokin, to know the minds of the Indians and their opinions of these times, and to get what intelligence I can from them and to encourage some of their young men to scout about back of the frontiers, to give us notice of the enemy's approach, if possible, at any time hereafter. I heartily wish your honor and the Assembly would please to agree on some method at this time towards protecting this province, as this part of it seems actually in danger now, for should but a company of Indians come and murder but a few families hereabouts, which is daily expected, the situation we are in would oblige numbers to abandon their plantations, and our cattle and provisions, which we have a plenty of, must then fall a prey to the enemy.

"Our Indians here seem much discouraged at the large number of families passing here every day on account of the late murders on the Potomac, and will be much more so if it should happen to be our case. There were two Indian women set out from here two days ago for the Ohio, to bring some of their relations (as they say) down here, and should the French or their Indians hear by them, as they will be inquiring for news, the effect that their late murders has had among our inhabitants it will be a matter of encouragement to them.

"I conclude, your honor's most obedient and most humble servant,

"JOHN HARRIS."

On the 23d of October, 1755, forty-six of the inhabitants about Harris' Ferry went to Shamokin to inquire of the Indians there who they were who had so cruelly fallen upon and ruined the settlement on Mahahony Creek. On their return from Shamokin they were fired upon by some Indians who lay in ambush, and four were killed, four drowned, and the rest put to flight. The following is the report of this expedition:

"I, and Thomas Forster, Esq., Mr. Harris, and Mr. McKee, with upwards of forty men, went up the 2d inst. (October, 1755) to Capt. McKee, at New Providence, in order to bury the dead lately murdered on Mahahony Creek; but understanding the corpse were buried, we then determined to return immediately home. But being urged by John Sekalany and the Old Belt to go up to see the Indians at Shamokin and know their minds, we went on the 24th, and stayed there all night; and in the night I heard some Delawares talking, about twelve in number, to this purpose: 'What are the English come here for?' Says another: 'To kill us, I suppose; can we then send off some of our nimble young men to give our friends notice that can soon be here?' They soon after sang the war-song, and four Indians went off in two canoes, well armed; the one canoe went down the river, and the other across.

"On the morning of the 25th we took our leave of the Indians and set off homewards, and were advised to go down the east side of the river; but, fearing that a snare might be laid on that side, we marched off peaceably on the west side, having behaved in the most civil and friendly manner towards them while with them; and when we came to the mouth of the Mahahony Creek, we were fired on by a good number of Indians that lay among the bushes, on which we were obliged to retreat with the loss of several men; the particular number I cannot exactly mention, but I am positive that I saw four fall, and one man struck with a tomahawk on the head in his flight across the river. As I understand the Delaware tongue, I heard several of the Indians that were engaged against us speak a good many words in that tongue during the action.

"ADAM TORRANCE."

"The above declaration was attested by the author's voluntary qualification, no magistrate being present, at Paxtang, this 26th October, 1755, before us:

"JOHN ELDER,	THOMAS McARTHUR.
"MICHAEL GRAHAM,	ALEX. McCLURE.
"MICHAEL TEAFF,	WILLIAM HARRIS.
"THOMAS BLACE,	SAMUEL LENS.
"SAMUEL PEARSON,	WILLIAM McCLURE.

"N.B.—Of all our people that were in the action there are but nine that are yet returned."

John Harris, under the date of "Paxtang, ye 28th October, 1755," writes to the Governor an account of the foregoing expedition to Shamokin, and how near they all came to suffer through Indian treachery:

"May it please your Honor

"This is to acquaint you, that on the 24th of October I arrived at Shamokin, in order to protect our frontiers up that way till they might make their escape from their cruel enemies, and learn the best intelligence I could.

"The Indians on the west branch of the Susquehanna certainly killed our inhabitants on Penn's Creek, and there are a batch and two English scalps sent by them up the North branch, to desire them to strike with them, if they are men.

"The Indians are all assembling themselves at Shamokin to counsel; a large body of them was there four days ago. I cannot learn their intentions, but secus Andrew Montour and Mena-ca-too-tha are to bring down the news from them. There is not a sufficient number of them to oppose the enemy, and, perhaps, they will join the enemy against us. There is no dependence on Indians, and we are in imminent danger.

"I got certain information from Andrew Montour and others that there is a body of French, with fifteen hundred Indians, coming upon us,—Picks, Ottaways, Orondax, Delawares, Shawanese, and a number of the Six Nations,—and are now not many days' march from the Province and Virginia, which are appointed to be attacked; at the same time some of the Shamokin Indians seem friendly, and others appear like enemies.

"Montour knew many days ago of the enemy being on their march against us before he informed, for which I said as much to him as I thought prudent, considering the place I was in.

"On the 25th inst., on my return with about forty more, we were attacked by about twenty or thirty Indians, received their fire, and about fifteen of our men and myself took to the trees, attacked the villains, killed four of them on the spot, and lost but three more, retreating about half a mile through woods, and crossing the Susquehanna, one of whom was shot off an horse riding behind myself, through the river. My horse was wounded, and, falling into the river, I was obliged to quit him and swim part of the way.

"Four or five of our men were drowned crossing the river. I hope our journey, though with fatigue and loss of our substance, and some of our lives, will be of service to our country, by discovering our enemy, who will be our ruin, if not timely prevented.

"I just now received information that there was a French officer, supposed captain, with a party of Shawanees, Delawares, &c., within six miles of Shamokin, ten days ago, and no doubt intends to take possession of it, which will be a dreadful consequence to us, if suffered. Therefore, I thought proper to despatch this message to inform your Honor. The Indians here, I hope, your Honor, will be pleased to cause them to remove to some place, as I do not like their company; and, as the men of those here were not against us, yet did them no harm, or else I would have them all cut off. Belt (Indian so-called) promised at Shamokin to send out spies to view the enemy, and, upon hearing of our skirmishes, Old Belt was in a rage, gathered up thirty Indians immediately, and went in pursuit of the enemy, as I am this day informed.

"I expect Montour and Moun-ca-too-tha down here this week, with the determination of their Shamokin council. The inhabitants are abandoning their plantations, and we are in a dreadful situation.

"I am, &c.,

"JOHN HARRIS.

"P.S.—The night ensuing our attack the Indians burnt all George Gabriel's houses; danced around them."

The person who was shot off the horse, while riding behind John Harris in crossing the river, was a physician of Paxtang, but in the absence of the assessment-lists we are unable to tell who he was. The Indians alluded to by John Harris as being at Harris' Ferry for some months were those to whom Conrad Weiser refers when writing from that place to the Governor in July (9th) previous, when he said,—

"According to your order, I came to this place last Monday, and found the Indians waiting for me. Yesterday I distributed about two hundred bushels of meal among them; after that was over, they enquired how things stood as to the war. I told them what had happened to some of the back inhabitants, and that the French Indians were like to do a great deal of mischief. They seemed to be very much concerned. There were about thirty of them, and of which number nine offered themselves to go with me, or my son Sammy, to Willis' Creek, and serve as outcasts against the French and their Indians, and to protect the poor people settled about those parts; and I was agreed that they should meet me or my son, at this place in ten days hence; and that in the mean time, I was to obtain your Honor's leave, and a proper pass. This morning Captain Glazier's express from the east arrived at this place, with the agreeable news of the defeat of the French at Nova Scotia, and the taking of the French men-of-war, by Admiral Boscawen.

"I read and explained the printed paper to the Indians, and they expressed a good deal of satisfaction and pleasure with the news. Capt. Glazier gave me to understand that he should be very glad if some of these Indians would accompany him to the English camp with the despatches he had for the general, in this dangerous time. I proposed it to the Indians; they approved of the thing, but having intelligence of our Honor's coming up, and that you would be in Lancaster this day, they would hear and receive your approbation; and they have accordingly desired me to stay with them at this place till your Honor's arrival, which I have promised to do, and have sent the bearer hereof express to let your Honor know of this and to receive further orders."

The Governor was there a few days after, made a short harangue, gave some presents, at which the Indians seemed perfectly delighted, and "the chain of friendship" was to remain "bright and unbroken." The Governor little knew of the perfidy of the savages, and that all their promises were mere ropes of sand.

The near approach of the enemy created the utmost consternation among the outer settlements. The only safety was to flee and leave all to the enemy. They had in vain looked for effectual relief from the Colonial government. Homes that had been occupied; barns filled with the fruits of a rich and plenteous harvest; newly-sowed fields, standing corn, and cattle, sheep, etc., were all abandoned by the hardy and industrious frontier settlers, in order to save themselves from being cut off by the barbarous enemy. Even John Harris and his family were threatened with death, as stated by Mr. Harris himself in the following letter to Edward Shippen, at Lancaster:

"PAXTANG, ye 29th October, 1755.

"Sir,—We expect the enemy upon us every day, and the inhabitants are abandoning their plantations, being greatly discouraged at the approach of such a number of cruel savages, and no present sign of assistance. I had a certain account of fifteen hundred French and Indians being on the march against us and Virginia, and now close upon our borders, their scouts scalping our families on our frontiers daily. Andrew Montour, and others at Shamokin, desired me to take care, that there was a party of forty Indians, out many days, and intended to burn my house and destroy myself and family. I have this day cut loop-holes in my house, and am determined to hold out to the last extremity, if I can get some men to stand by me. But few can be had at present, as every one is in fear of his own family being cut off every hour. Great part of the Susquehanna Indians are no doubt actually in the French interest, and I am informed that a French officer is expected at Shamokin this week, with a party of Delawares and Shawanees, no doubt to take possession of our river. We should raise men immediately to build a fort up the river to take possession, and to induce some Indians to join us. We ought also to insist on the Indians to declare for or against us, and as soon as we are prepared for them we should bid up their scalps, and keep our woods full of our people upon the scout, else they will ruin our province, for they are a dreadful enemy. I have sent out two Indian spies to Shamokin; they are Mohawks.

"Sir, yours, &c.,

JOHN HARRIS."

CHAPTER V.

The French and Indian War (continued)—Treaty at Harris' Ferry—Fort Halifax—Fort McKee—Fort Maudslayi—Fort at Harris' Ferry—Fort Hnoter.

IN the latter part of October, 1755, the enemy again appeared in the neighborhood of Shamokin, and in November of that year they committed several murders upon the whites under circumstances of great cruelty and barbarity. Not only the settlers on the immediate frontier, but those residing far towards the interior, were kept in constant alarm, as will be seen by the following address, or appeal to the inhabitants of the Province, issued from the present site of Harrisburg:

"PAXTANG, ye 31st October, 1755.

"From John Harris, at 12 P.M.

"To all His Majesty's subjects in the Province of Pennsylvania, or elsewhere:

"Whereas, Andrew Montour, Belt of Wampum, two Mohawks, and other Indians, came down this day from Shamokin, who say the whole body of Indians, or the greatest part of them in the French interest, is actually escaped on this side of George Gabriel's (about thirty miles north of Harris' Ferry, on the west side of the river), near Susquehanna, and we may expect an attack within three days at farthest; and a French fort to be begun at Shamokin in ten days hence. Tho' this be the Indian report, we, the subscribers, do give it as our advice to repair immediately to the frontiers with all our forces, to intercept their passage into our country, and to be prepared in the best manner possible for the worst events.

"Witness our hands,

"JAMES GALBREATH,

"JOHN ALLISON,

"BARNEY HUGHES,

"ROBERT WALLACE,

"JOHN HARRIS.

JAMES POLLOCK,

JAMES ANDERSON,

WILLIAM WORK,

PATRICK HAYES,

"P.S.—They positively affirm that the above named Indians discovered a party of the enemy at Thomas McKee's upper place on the 30th of October last.

"Mona-en-too-tha, The Belt, and other Indians here, insist upon Mr. Weiser's coming immediately to John Harris' with his men, and to counsel with the Indians.

"Before me,

"JAMES GALBREATH."

Fortunately, the reports conveyed in Mr. Harris' letter, as well as in the above address, proved to be premature, the enemy confining his depredations to the regions of the Susquehanna, about Shamokin, and the Great or Big Cove in the western part of Cumberland County, a detailed account of which would not come within our province to write.

It was not until the middle of the following year that the Indians, incited, and in some instances officered, by their allies the French, extended their incursions into the interior of the Province, and imagination fails to conceive the peril and distress of the settlers of Paxtang, Hanover, and the other townships of Lancaster, now comprising the counties of Dauphin and Lebanon.

On the 8th of January, 1756, Governor Morris, who had come from Philadelphia by way of Reading, held a conference with the Indians at the house of John Harris. As a part of the history of this locality, it is proper that the record thereof be preserved in this connection :

"At a conference held with the Indians at Harris' Ferry, Jan. 8, 1756, present the Hon. Robert Hunter Morris, Governor James Hamilton, Richard Peters, Joseph Fox, and Conrad Weiser, interpreter; two Indians of the Six Nations, called 'the Belt of Waopuon,' a Seneca, and 'The Broken Thigh,' a Mohawk.

"The Governor, finding here only two Indians and their families, he sent for them into council, and spoke as follows:

"Brethren :

"I am glad to see you and your families in good health. You have ever been esteemed our hearty friends, and you show you are really so by residing amongst us, at a time when so much mischief is done on every side of the Province.

"I sent Mr. Weiser to acquaint you that I had kindled a council fire here, and had invited the Indians on Susquehanna to meet me the beginning of this moon, and that I expected you would stay here till I should come, and afford me your assistance in council.

"I thank you for staying here. You see that agreeable to my message, I come at the time appointed, but I find so other Indians here than you two, and indeed I expect no more, as I believe my messengers were prevented going to Wyomink by the ravages of the Indians, which began in their neighborhood at the time they were preparing to set out on their journey.

"Brethren: The public business requires my presence at Carlisle, where I am now going, and I invite you to go along with me. If you incline to take any of your families with you, I shall readily agree to it, and provide a carriage for them and you.'

"To this the Belt replied.

"Brethren: I thank you for sending for us to council, and for your kind speech. What you have said is very agreeable.

"Brethren: The sky is dark all around us. The mischief done to you I consider as done to the Six Nations, and am sorry for what has happened, and heartily condole with you upon it, but be not disheartened. As the public business is committed to you, nothing should be suffered to lie on your minds that night, in any wise, impair your judgment, which is now more necessary than ever. Let me, therefore, by this string entreat you to put away all grief from your heart, and to dry up your tears, that you may think and see clearly when you come to council.

"I accept your invitation, and shall follow you to Carlisle.'

"GAVE A STRING."

From the minutes of the treaty or conference held at that time it appears there was but one single house and few conveniences to hold a treaty at Harris'—
"Mr. Weiser was called in and asked if it might not be better to hold it at Carlisle, where all the business of that county could be done at the same time, and proper entertainment provided as well for the Governor and his company as for the Indians, should they prove numerous."

In the early part of 1756, of the Provincial forces there were stationed at Harris', a sergeant and twelve men; at Hunter's Fort, Ensign Johnson and twenty-four men; at McKee's Store, Ensign Mears and twenty-four men; at Fort Halifax, Capt. Nathaniel Miles and thirty men; and at Fort Maudy, Lieut. Miller and sixteen men.

In the spring of 1756 the Provincial troops were well organized, and within the limits of Dauphin County the following stockade forts were erected :

FORT HALIFAX.—This fort, also named the Fort at Armstrong's, was commenced in May, 1756. Col. Clapham, an officer of the Provincial service, selected it "as the most convenient place on the river between Harris's and Shamokin for a magazine on account of its good natural situation above the Juniata Falls, the vast plenty of pine timber at hand, its nearness to Shamokin and a saw within a quarter of a mile, he therefore concludes to erect a fort here, according to a plan enclosed to the Gov'r, and for that purpose had already cut and squared 200 logs and hauled 80 to the spot, each about 30 feet long, and made some progress in laying them, rather than lose time by delay with the troops, & as men sufficient to finish it in a fortnight after the logs were hauled could be had in the neighborhood at a reasonable rate, under a guard of an officer and 30 men, he proposed to proceed on the march with the troops, he has 20 batteaux finished and 2 Canoes to bring up provisions, having already made 5 trips to McKee's store and 2 to this place, two different parties were sent out as scouts towards Shamokin."

On the 8th of June, says the colonel in his report to the Governor, he "was agreeably surprised on seeing a canoe coming down the River with a red flag, having on board an Iroquois Ind'n Chief and his son charged with a belt of wampum from the Six Nations; a Cayuga Indian was at first with them, but lauded at Chocconotte above Wyoming, being deterred by the reports of Shekelamy."

On the 10th of June, Col. Clapham held a conference there with the Iroquois chief, which is reported as follows:

"At a conference held at the camp at Armstrong's June 10, 1756, between Col. William Clapham and Oghragradisha, an Indian chief of the Iroquois, on the waters of Susquehanna.

"Present, Capt. Lloyd and Shippen; Interpreters, James Lowry and Lewis Montour.

"My Brother, Col. Johnston, at my departure, told me, thus brother; I find great difficulties in governing and supplying the wants of the Six Nations, in connection with me, 'tis therefore impossible I should also take charge of those seated at a distance on the waters of the Susque-banua, for which reason I have recommended them by you, and this string of wampum to Col. Clapham (or Ugarunthinth) for that purpose.

"Brother, The Iroquois living on the North Branch of Susquehanna have sent me as a representative of the whole to treat with you (producing a belt of wampum) and will ratify all my contracts. Brother, they agree to your building a fort at Shamokin, but are desirous that you should also build a Fort three day's journey, in a canoe, higher up the North Branch, in their country, at a place called 'Adjouquay,' and this belt of wampum is to clear the road to that place.

"Brother, If you agree to my proposals in behalf of my nation, I will return and immediately collect our whole force to be employed in protecting your people while you are building a fort in our country at Adjouquay, where there is a good situation and fine soil at the entrance of a deep creek, on a level plain five miles extending, and clear of woods. Adjouquay is fourteen miles above Wioning, and an old woman may carry a heavy pack of skis from thence to the Minisick, and return to Adjouquay in two nights.

"My Brother, the land is troubled, and you may justly apprehend danger, but if you will grant our request we will be together, and if any danger happens to you we will share it with you. My brother, I have known this young man a good while (pointing to James Lowry) and have traveled far with him; he is a proper man, and knows the country well. I should be glad to recommend him as a companion on the march.

"My Brother (laying down a belt of wampum folded in the middle) this describes your path to Shamokin; (unfolding the belt and extending it to its full length) this is your road to Adjouquay."

"Upon which he presented a belt and offered his little son as a pledge of his fidelity, insisting at the same that Col. Clapham should visit their town, escorted by their warriors who, desiring to turn out of their way, would conduct him through the Delaware town to their village to defiance of all opposition whatever."

The orders and instructions to Col. Clapham in regard to the erection of the fort were as follows, although he was subsequently directed to diminish the size, but having proceeded too far with the work, which in his opinion was already too small, he continued on with the dimensions as at first ordered:

"1. With these instructions you will receive a number of blank commissions, under my hand and seal, for subaltern officers in your regiment, which you are hereby empowered to fill up with the names of such men as you judge most fit for the service, having regard to the merit and services of those already employed; taking care that they be of the Protestant religion, and well affected to his Majesty's government, and you will administer to them the oaths to the government, as your name is inserted in the General Dedimus for this Province, under the Great Seal, or cause Major Burd to do it.

"2. Herewith you will also receive two plans of Forts; the one a Pentagon, the other a square, with one Ravelin to protect the curtain where the gate is, with a ditch covered way and glacis; but as it is impossible to give any explicit directions to the particular form of a fort without viewing and considering the ground on which it is to stand, I must leave it to you to build it in such form as will best answer for its own defence, the command of the river, and of the country in its neighborhood; and the plans herewith will serve to show the proportion that the different parts of the works should bear to each other.

"3. As to the place upon which this fort is to be erected, that must be in a great measure left to your judgment; but it is necessary to inform you it must be on the east side of the Susquehanna; the lands on the west, at the Forks, between the branches, not being purchased from the Indians; besides it would be impossible to relieve and support a garrison on that side in the winter time. From all the information I have been able to collect, the land on the south side of the east branch, opposite to the middle of the island, is the highest of any of the lowland thereabout, and the best place for a fort. The guns you have with you will form a rampart of a moderate height, commanding the main river. But as this information comes from persons not acquainted with the nature of such things, I am fearful they are not much to be depended on, and your own judgment must therefore direct you.

"4. When you have completed the fort, you will cause the ground to be cleared about it, to a convenient distance, and openings to be made to the river, and you will erect such buildings within the fort, and place them in such a manner as you shall judge best.

"5. Without the fort, at a convenient distance, under the command of the guns, it will be necessary to build some log houses for Indians, that they may have places to lodge in, without being in the fort, where numbers of them, however friendly, should not be admitted, but in a formal manner, and the guard turned out; this will be esteemed a compliment by our friends, and if enemies should at any time be concealed under that name, it will give them proper notions of our vigilance, and prevent them from attempting to surprise it.

"6. In your march up the river you will take care not to be surprised, and always to have your forces in such a disposition that you may retreat with safety.

"7. You will make the best observations you can of the river and the most difficult passes you meet with in your way, as well by land as water, which you will note upon the map I gave you, that it may be thereby amended, and furnish me with your opinion of the best manner of removing or surmounting those difficulties.

"8. If you should be opposed in your march, or gain any intelligence of the approach of an enemy, for that or any other purpose, you will inform me by express of such intelligence or opposition, the situation you are in, and everything else material that I may send you proper assistance, and be prepared for anything that may happen, and in the meantime you are to use your best endeavors to oppose the enemy and to secure yourself.

"9. As soon as you are in possession of the ground at Shamokin you will secure yourself a breastwork in the best manner you can, so that your men may work in safety, and you will inform me of your arrival there, and let me know what you will have occasion for, that I may apply to the commissioners to supply it.

"10. You will order the company and others in whose hands you may trust any of the public provisions or stores, to be careful and exact in the distribution thereof, and to keep exact accounts of everything committed to their care.

"11. Having suspected hostilities against the Delaware Indians on the east side of the Northeast Branch of Susquehanna, in order to enter into a treaty with them, I send you herewith a proclamation for that purpose, to which you will conform, and any friendly Indians that may join you in your march or at Shamokin, you will treat with kindness, and supply them out of the Province stores with such things as they want and you are able to spare.

"12. Having sent the Indians—New Castle and Jagers—again to the town of Diaboga, accompanied with some of the Jersey Delawares, all our friends, who may and probably will return by the Susquehanna, you will in about a fortnight after this cause a lookout to be kept for them, and, if they return that way, you will receive and assist them in their journey. Their signal will be a red flag, with 'union' in the corner, or, if that should be lost, they will carry 'green boughs' or 'club'd muskets,' will appear open and erect, and oot approach you in the night.

"R. H. MORRIS.

"Given under my hand and seal at Arms, Philadelphia, this 12th day of June, 1756."

On the 20th of June, Col. Clapham writes to Governor Morris from the "Camp at Armstrong's":

"Sir,—I received your Honor's of the 12th inst., together with your Honor's instructions, your Honor's answer to the Indian sachem, six blank commissions, and two plans of fortification. Your instructions I shall obey with the utmost pleasure and punctuality. Your answer I delivered with due solemnity. In filling up the commissions I shall be particularly careful to regard your Honor's directions. When arrived at the ground I shall conform as near as possible to the plans, and hope I shall find no difficulty in the execution which industry and application may not surmount, and shall rely on your Honor for the supplies necessary during that time. The progress already made in this fort renders it impracticable for me to comply with the commissioners desire to contract it, at which I am more surprised, as I expected every day orders to enlarge it, it being as yet, in my opinion, too small. I shall leave an officer and thirty men, with orders to finish it, when I march from hence, which will be with all possible expedition after the arrival of the blankets, the rum and the money for payment of battoo-men, for want of which I am obliged to detain them here in idleness, not thinking it prudent to trust them on another trip for fear of their desertion, which may totally impede the service. I could wish the commissioners would invent some expedient to pay these men without money, or at least without the danger of trusting me with their money, the charge of which I am not ambitious of, or the much envied honor and trouble of expending it. This far is certain, that without such expedient or the money, we cannot stir.

"I have, pursuant to your Honor's command, sent down two Indian Sachems properly escorted, and committed particularly to the care of Mr. Shippen, and hope his coming will fully answer the ends proposed by your Honor and your council. I have found Capt. McKee extremely useful, and have sent him also at the Sachem's particular request.

"The carpenters are still employed in building Battoes and carriages for the canoe, and everybody seems disposed cheerfully to contribute their services towards the public good, if there ever was any prospect or assurance of being paid for it. From your Honor's character of Capt. Busse, I am extremely sorry the Commissioners have not thought proper to comply with your Honor's proposal. I assure myself, your Honor, will omit no opportunity of extricating me from embarrassments arising from the want of money, both for the Battoe men and the soldiers; twenty-six of whom being Dutch (German) are now in confinement for mutiny on that very account. I am with all respect your Honor's obedient servant.

"WILLIAM CLAPHAM.

"P.S.—The Fort at this place is without a name till your Honor is pleased to confer one."

On the 25th of the month the Governor writes from Philadelphia to Col. Clapham, "The fort at Armstrong's I would have it called Fort Halifax." At the same time that official is pleased with its progress, and urges him to leave for Shamokin as soon as possible. The former writes under date of 1st July, 1756:

"SIR,—I received your favor by Commissary Burd, and the £100, which I distributed among the Battoe men in proportion to their several demands, it not being sufficient to discharge the whole. The ship-carpenters have finished the carriages for the canoe, and as soon as they have finished the Battoes in hand, which I expect will be done to-morrow, I shall give them a certificate of their services and discharge them all except one, who will be absolutely necessary in the passage, and without whose assistance we may probably lose more than his pay can cost the Province; now if my people are to be depended on in case of an accident on the water, and I can assure your Honor that I find fatigue and difficulties enough to conduct so amphibious an expedition with all the assistance I can possibly command. I shall leave a sergeant's party at Harris' consisting of twelve men, twenty-four at Hunter's Fort, twenty-four at McKee's store, each under the command of an ensign; and Capt. Miles, with thirty men, at Fort Halifax, with the inclosed instructions, as I have removed all the stores from Harris' and McKee's to this place; Mr. Galbreath's presence does not seem very necessary at either of those two places, and his refusal to attend here has laid me under the necessity of appointing a person to act in that capacity under the direction of Commissary Burd till your pleasure shall be known. I am at present extremely engaged in enlarging the regiments, stores, etc., for Shamokin, expecting to march time enough to-night on the west side of Susquehanna, about five miles above Fort Halifax, and promising myself the pleasure of congratulating your Honor from Shamokin; and in the mean time, very respectfully your Honor's most obedient, humble servant.

"WILLIAM CLAPHAM.

"P.S.—There are still one hundred blankets waiting in the regiment."

The fort was left in charge of Capt. Nathaniel Miles, with the following instructions, dated "Fort Halifax, 1st July, 1756:"

"SIR,—You are to command a party of thirty men at Fort Halifax, which you are to finish with all possible expedition, observing not to suffer your party to struggle in small numbers into the woods, or to go any great distance from the fort unless detached as an escort, or in case of special orders for that purpose. You are to build barracks within the fort for your men and also a store-house thirty feet by twelve, in which you are carefully to lodge all provisions, stores, etc., belonging to the province; if the boards purchased for that purpose are not sufficient to finish the banquettes and execute the other designs herein recommended, your men are to be employed in sawing more out of the pine-tlogs now lying near the fort. You are to keep a constant guard, and relieve regularly, to have continual one sentry in each bastion, and in case of an attack to retreat to the fort and defend it to the last extremity.

"If anything extraordinary occurs you are immediately to dispatch notice thereof to his honor the governor, and to signify the same to me if any relief or instruction may be necessary.

"WILLIAM CLAPHAM."

On the 17th of August there was very little ammunition here, and on October 9th, according to a return by Capt. Jameson, "the Garrison consisted of two Sergeants, two Corporals, forty-two privates—ammunition, 160lbs Gunpowder, 300lbs musket balls, and 60lbs shot and lead,—provisions 14000lbs, fresh beef, 1 Bbl. salt beef, and 700lbs flour. An escort is ordered of fifteen men under a serjeant to conduct the Waggon Master General, Mr. Irwin, from Hunter's to Fort Halifax, there join a detachment from Capt. Jameson's Company, to be commanded by Lieut. Anderson, and march to Fort Augusta. To preserve communications between the inhabitants and Augusta and for conveniency of Escorts and Transportation of provisions and ammunition there should be one hundred in Garrison at Fort Halifax." In July, 1757, a petition was presented to the Governor for a removal of the garrison from Halifax to Hunter's, the defense of the former being considered of little account to the inhabitants south of the mountains. It is supposed this removal was soon effected, for we hear nothing more of its occupancy. It was situated on the east bank of the Susquehanna, near the mouth of Armstrong's Creek, about half a mile above the town of Halifax.

FORT MCKEE.—With regard to the time of the erection of this fort and its precise locality we are ignorant. But as we find instructions to Thomas McKee, dated Jan. 26, 1756, we suppose it to have been erected in 1756. He is directed "to receive from the officer commanding the detachment of Capt. Reed's company at Hunter's Mill, and who you are to relieve, such arms, accoutrements, blankets, tools, and stores as he may have in his hands belonging to the Province, with which you are to furnish your company; but if that should not be sufficient, you are to apply to Capt. Frederick Smith for a further supply out of what he will receive from Capt. Reed and Capt. Heudricks." He is afterwards appointed, under a commission, captain of a company, to consist of twenty-eight men and two sergeants, besides himself and lieutenants. He is ordered to "proceed immediately to raise the company; when complete, they are to be mustered before James Galbraith, Esq., and after being mustered they are to march to a place called Hunter's Mill, on the Susquehanna River, and either complete the fort already begun there, or build another at such convenient place as James Galbraith shall advise; and in case it should be thought necessary to erect a new fort, you are to build it of the form and dimensions herewith given to you." The next notice of it is in a letter from Edward Shippen, dated Lancaster, April 19th, where he says, "I have been at Capt. McKee's fort, where I found several Indians—several women very sick in bed. John Shekellamy was there, but did not like his situation"—"there is no room scarce at Capt. McKee's fort for provisions"—"the enemy can come over the hills at five miles from McKee's Fort"—"there are several bad passes as far as McKee's plantation, where I have been, it is but 25 miles from Hunter's Mill." Colonel Clapham says to Governor Morris, "I shall have 24 men at McKee's store under the command of an Ensign, as I have removed all the stores from Harris' and McKee's to this place (Halifax). May 17. They have very little ammunition at McKee's." It was named for Thomas McKee, the Indian trader, who had a plantation on the Susquehanna, near the falls which still bear his name. It was situated on the East Branch of the Susquehanna, between Forts Halifax and Augusta. It was probably a stockade, nothing more.

FORT MANADY.—This fort was erected in 1755, and was situated on or near the Manady Creek, in East Hanover township, Dauphin Co., probably near the gap in the mountain of the same name as the fort. It was sometimes called the stockade at Robertson's Mill, and in the centre between Fort Hunter and Swatara.

But little seems to have been known of this fort, or rather stockade, for it was probably nothing more. The creek still retains its name, and is a branch of Swatara. Here Col. Burd, in February, 1758, promised the country people to station an officer and twenty-five men, which gave the people content. Jan. 26, 1756, in instructions to Adam Reed, it is said, "Having appointed Captain Frederick Smith to take post with an independent company at the Gap where the Swatara passes the mountains, and to station a detachment of his company at Manady, there will be no necessity of your continuing longer upon guard in that part of the frontier; you will therefore dismiss the men now employed in that service and deliver to Captain Smith such arms and accoutrements, blankets, and stores, belonging to the Province, as have at any time come to your hands." And under same date, after instructing Captain Frederick Smith to leave a part of his company at Swatara, he is directed "to proceed to the Gap, where the River Manady passes the mountains, and either take possession and strengthen the stockade already erected there, or erect a new one as you shall judge best," and then return to the fort at Swatara. He is to "leave 20 men, under the command of a commissioned officer, at the Fort at Manady." Capt. Smith is to communicate his instructions to the officers he shall have at the fort at Manady. Col. Weiser, in a letter to Governor Morris, July 11, 1756, says, "9 men are to stay constantly in Manady Fort, and 6 men to range Eastward from Manady toward Swatara, and 6 men to range Westward towards Susquehanna, and each party to reach the fort before night." James Galbraith says, in a letter to Edward Shippen, dated Derry, 9th August, "there were two soldiers killed and one wounded about two miles from Manady." Justice Reed informs Edward Shippen, in October, of Indians being at the house of Philip Robertson, whose son being on the corner of the fort, watching others dressing flesh by him, observed an Indian, who fled, but was fired upon by the watchman, who missed him. This was about three-quarters of a mile from Manady Fort. The journal of James Patterson, from Fort Hunter, says, "I took with me 19 men, and ranged this fort as far as Robinson's Fort, where I lodged, keeping guard of 6 men and one corporal on sentry that night. On the 6th of July I sent a sergeant and corporal, with 15 men, along the frontiers of Paxtang and Manadys, about 14 miles from this fort, and on the 7th they returned to said fort (Hunter), having seen some Indians who ran off."

FORT AT HARRIS' FERRY.—This was simply a stockade. On the 29th of October, 1755, John Harris writes to Edward Shippen at Lancaster that he has advice that forty Indians "are out many days and intend to burn my house and destroy myself and family. I have this day cut holes in my house and is determined to hold out till the last extremity if I can get some men to stand by me, few of which I can at present, every one being in fear of their own families being cut off every hour (such is our situation), he recommends building a strong fort up Susquehanna [p. 656]." Governor Morris held a conference with the Indians, Jan. 8, 1756, at Harris', there being then but "one single house and few conveniences;" "but two Indians and their families" attended, and the conference was adjourned to Carlisle by advice of Col. Weiser, where they met January 13th, and then to Lancaster, and the result seems to have been a determination to erect a chain of forts along the Susquehanna. On April 19, 1756, Mr. Shippen writes the Governor that "John Harris has built an excellent Stockade round his house, which is the only place of security that way for the provisions for the army, he having much good cellar room, and as he has but six or seven men to guard it, if the Governor would order six more men there to strengthen it, it would in my opinion be of great use to the cause, even were no provisions to be stored at all" . . . "this stockade of Harris' ought by all means to be supported." John Harris, writing on the 5th of November, the same year, says, "Here is at my fort two prisoners that came from Shamokin." Again he writes to the Governor, "I hope your honor will be pleased to continue some men here during these calamitous times in our frontiers, as this place and the conveniences here may be of service if defended," . . . "we have had a town-meeting since the murders committed in Hanover township, and have unanimously agreed to support twenty men in our township at the mountain, there to range and keep guard, or watch day and night for one month."

FORT AT ROBINSON'S.—This was probably only a private fort, erected about 1755, at the house of Samuel Robinson, in Hanover township. Governor Morris, in a letter to him on Nov. 11, 1755, says, "At the request of the people of Hanover Town, in your neighborhood, I have ordered one hundredweight of gunpowder and two hundredweight of lead to be delivered to you, which you will carry to the fort at your house and distribute among the inhabitants in as equal a manner as may be, and recommend it to them to be careful of it." In December, 1758, James Patterson, in his journal, at Fort Hunter, says, "I took with me nineteen men and ranged from this fort as far as Robinson's Fort, where I lodged, keeping a guard of six men and one corporal on sentry that night." It is probable that this last, as well as the former paragraph, alludes to Fort Manady, which was situated in Hanover township, and was sometimes known as the "stockade at Robertson's Mill," and in the centre between Fort Hunter and Swatara. (See "Fort Manady.")

FORT HUNTER.—When or by whom this fort was erected is not certainly known from the records. It was probably as early as 1755, as in an order to Adam Reed, Jan. 10, 1756, a fort is spoken of at Hunter's mill. It is there said that "the commissioners thinking that the company of fifty men under your command are sufficient to guard the frontier along the Kitchitiny Hills from your own house to Hunter's mill, have refused for the present to take any other men in that quarter into the pay of the government, and requested me to order, and I do hereby accordingly order you to detach twenty-five of the men now at your house to the fort at Hunter's mill, upon the Susquehanna, under the command of your lieutenant or officer next under yourself, to range the woods along and near the mountains towards your house," and another party to "range towards Hunter's mill." To these are to be added twenty more men of Paxtang township, making thirty for that service. Thomas McKee was appointed to take post at or near Hunter's mill, and to receive from the commanding officer there the detachment of Capt. Reed's company, with arms, etc., belonging to the Province. On the 26th of January, 1756, James Galbraith is told by the Governor that "Thomas McKee is instructed to advise with him whether to finish the fort already begun at Hunter's mill or to build a new one, and as to the place where it would be best to erect such new one."

Governor Morris writes to Col. Clapham, on the 7th of April, 1756, "As a magazine of provisions and other warlike stores will very soon be formed at or near Hunter's mill upon the river Susquehanna, I think it necessary for the protection thereof and for other purposes, to order that you appoint the said place called Hunter's mill, or some convenient place near it, for the general rendezvous of the regiments now raising, and that you order all the men already enlisted, not employed on some other service, to march immediately to the said rendezvous, and all your recruiting parties to send their recruits thither from time to time. You will order proper guards upon the magazine, and upon the boats and canoes which shall be collected there pursuant to my orders you will give directions that the officers and men keep themselves in good order, and ready to go upon duty at an hour's warning." On April 16, 1746, the Governor informs the commander that he has ordered "Colonel Clapham to rendezvous his regiment at or near Hunter's mill, where he has ordered a number of canoes to be collected and fitted for transporting the stores to Shamokin."

Col. Weiser is ordered to send two of the most trusty Indians to Hunter's mill for intelligence. There is great confusion among the Indians up the West Branch of the Susquehanna. Col. Clapham says, July 1, from Halifax, "that he shall leave at Harris' a serjeant's party consisting of 12 men, 24 at Hunter's fort. The fort here wants ammunition." Edward Shippen, speaking, on the 19th of April, of Harris' as a storehouse, says, "Hunter's house indeed would answer such a purpose were it stockaded; but as it is quite naked and stands 5 or 600 feet from the fort, the enemy may surprise it and kill the people and set the roof on fire in three or four places at once, and if the sentries should discern the fire as soon as it begins to blaze, it might be too difficult a task for them to quench it without buckets or pails. Hunter's mill is but 25 miles from Capt. McKee's plantation." This Capt. McKee is spoken of on 24th February as having had the command "of a fort at Hunter's mill, near the place where the blue hills cross the Susquehanna."

Col. Clapham writes to the Governor on the 11th of June, 1756, "I have also stationed a party of 24 men under the command of Mr. Johnson, at Hunter's fort, with orders to defend that post and the neighborhood, and to escort any provisions that should come to him up to McKee's store." On the 25th of November the commanding officer is ordered "to take great care of the bateaux," and "to weigh the two cannon which now lie in the water."

On the 13th of November the state of the garrison was, "2 serjeants, 34 privates—ammunition, 4½ pounds powder, 28 pounds lead—provisions, 1000 pounds flour, 2000 pounds beef—2 men's times up." Robert Erwin, on his way from Philadelphia with horses, applies to Mr. Mears, commandant, for an escort of fifteen men from the garrison, as he understood from Maj. Burd, at Augusta, Col. Clapham had ordered to be furnished, but was refused, saying, "Colonel Clapham had no command of him or his men." Learning that there was the greatest want of horses at Augusta, Mr. Erwin pursued his journey without the escort.

Governor Denny writes to the Proprietaries, 9th April, 1757, "The long frontier between the Susquehanna and Delaware was to be defended by Col. Weiser's battalion, and all the forts reduced to three (of which this fort does not appear to be one), with a garrison of one hundred men." Rev. John Elder, 30th July, 1757, says, "The defense of Halifax is of no advantage, but a garrison at Hunter's, under the command of an active officer, will be of great service. It will render the carriage of provisions and munitions for the use of Augusta more easy and less expensive, and by encouraging the inhabitants to continue in their places will prevent the weakening of the settlements." James Galbraith, writing from this fort Oct. 1, 1757, says, "Notwithstanding the happy situation we thought this place was in on Capt. Bussé's being stationed here, we have had a man killed and scalped this evening within twenty rods of Hunter's Fort. We all turned out, but night coming on so soon we could make no pursuit." And Capt. Bussé writes that "twelve Indians were seen, but rainy weather prevented pursuit." James Patterson with his men were at this fort, and in his journal gives an interesting account of his operations against the Indians, who were constantly appearing. On the 9th of February, 1758, there was one company of fifty-four men in the pay of the Province. Adj. Kern, on the 5th, returns under Capt. Patterson and Lieut. Allen forty men, with forty-four Provincial arms, three having their own; fifteen pounds powder, and twenty pounds lead. Barnabas Hughes was commissary here and at Swatara, which was twenty-four miles from this fort. James Burd in his journal (February 18th) "arrived at the fort at dark, and found Capts. Patterson and Davis there with eighty men, who informed him they had not above three loads of ammunition per man. He ordered Barny Hughes to send up a barrel of powder and lead; answerable in the mean time; borrowed of Thomas Gallaher forty pounds of powder and one hundred pounds of lead. On the 19th he reviewed "Captain Patterson's company, and found them complete 53 men, 44 province arms, and 44 cartouch boxes—no powder nor lead—divided $\frac{1}{2}$ pint powder and lead in proportion a man; found in this fort four months provision for the garrison." "Captain Davis with his party of 55 men was out of ammunition, divided a $\frac{1}{2}$ pint powder and lead in proportion to them. Captain Davis has got 12000 pounds of flour for the bateaux; sundry of the bateaux are leaky, that they can't swim and must be left behind. Captain Patterson can't scout at present for want of officers; 3 men sick here." "Hence he went to Crawford's, 14 miles from Hunter's." G. Price writes Governor Denny, from whom he had a commission, from Fort Hunter, on the 20th July, 1758, "I was left in the garrison of Fort Hunter and received orders from General Forbes to repair it, and sent an engineer to inspect into its condition, who found necessary to stockade it, for which purpose I was to get the country people; and accordingly applied to the several justices for the townships of Paxtang and Donegal, from whom he had no answer except by Parson Elder, who said nothing could be done till after harvest. The stockades are cut." Joseph Shippen, Jr., 23d

June, 1763, was engaged at Fort Hunter in receiving and forwarding to Augusta, by bateaux and canoes, provisions and other necessaries as they arrived from Philadelphia in wagons.

Such are all the important facts to be collected from the records.

The site of Fort Hunter is situated exactly six miles above Harrisburg, on the Susquehanna River, at its junction with Fishing Creek. There are no remains of this fort, as upon its ancient foundations there is a very large storehouse, built by Archibald McAllister in 1814. The situation of this house is very commanding, about eighty feet above the river Susquehanna, and the surrounding scenery is of the most romantic character.

During the Revolutionary war and the early periods of our history, the block-house or fort occupied the site upon which now stands the large stone residence owned by the estate of Daniel D. Boas. This fort was called the "English Fort Hunter." About a mile above this point, where the river has evidently forced its way through a mountain-pass, and where the river is narrow, deep, and swift, immediately below the romantic village of Dauphin, where immense rocks (not yet worn away by the hand of time or the friction of the water) jut out of the water, at this point, at the very base of the Kittochtinny Mountains, the river is called Hunter's Falls.

In distinction from the "English Fort Hunter," there was another fort about one mile below this on the summit of the Second Mountain, a very high peak, entirely commanding the Susquehanna River, overlooking Harrisburg, and called the "Indian Fort Hunter." At this point, tradition informs us, the Indians had some sort of an erection from which they would occasionally emerge, and after committing great depredations, would again retire to their stronghold, which was the terror of the country.

CHAPTER VI.

The French and Indian War (continued)—Second Treaty at Harris' Ferry—The Indian Barbarities—Letters from Adam Reed—Journal of Rev. Charles Beatty in 1756—Officers and Men from Dauphin in the Provincial Service.

IN the spring of 1757, Col. George Croghan, deputy Indian agent for North America, was instrumental in gathering at Harris' Ferry a large representation of the Six Nation Indians, of the Delawares and the Shawanese. Information was at once sent to the Governor. The following are the minutes of the proceedings held at this point:

"At a meeting of the Six Nations and their allies and George Croghan, Esq., Deputy agent to the Hon. Sir William Johnson, Baronet, his Majesty's sole agent and superintendent of affairs of the Six Nations, their allies and dependants, and by his special order, at John Harris', the first day of April, 1757.

Present: The Revd. John Elder, Capt. Thomas McKee, Mr. James Armstrong, Mr. Hugh Crawford, Mr. John Harris, William Prentup, Interpreter.

"Mohawks: Tihansorea, Connadaganghia, Sogeo-hanna, Peter, with thirty-one others, men, women, and children.

"Oneidas: Thomas King, Scarroyady, Tawnaquan-agis, with thirty others, men, women, and children.

"Tuscaroras: Reet King, with twenty-six others, men, women, and children.

"Onondagoes: Ossaratonqua and his two brothers, with eighteen others, men, women, and children.

"Nauticokes: Robert White, Joshua, with fourteen more, men, women, and children.

"Cayugas: Ogaratawrea, Orranoquare, Jenkasarone, with twenty others, men, women, and children.

"Delawares: Samuel, Joseph Peepy, Thomas Evans, Jonathan, with twenty men, women, and children.

"Senecas: George, with eight more, men, women, and children.

"Connestogoes: Sahays, Captain John, with twenty-nine men, women, and children."

The greater part of the proceedings were at Lancaster; the following were at Harris' Ferry:

"Brother: You and our brother Onas wisely considered the ancient custom of our forefathers, in condoling with us and mixing your grief with ours. And as we make no doubt but some of your wise connections are dead since we were here, and many of our brethren have been killed by the evil spirit, we wipe the blood off your council-seats and put them in order with this belt of wampum. (Gave a belt.)

"Brother: After wiping the blood off your council-seats, we, with those few skins, wrap up the bones of our brethren that died or were killed by the evil spirit, and cover their graves. (Gave a small bundle of skins.)

"Brother: We, by this belt of wampum, wipe the tears from your eyes, and desire you may mourn no more. (Gave a belt of wampum.)

"Brother: We, with this belt of wampum, disperse the dark clouds, that the sun may always shine upon us in friendship; we heal your heart and free your mind from troubles, that we may meet each other in council and brighten the chain of friendship made by our forefathers, and that the council-fire may burn clear we throw a few chips on it." (Gave a belt.)

The same evening, Col. Croghan had a meeting of the sachems, and proposed going to Philadelphia to hold the treaty; but he could not prevail on any of them to go there, except the Mohawks; the rest were afraid of sickness. When he found they were not to be prevailed on to go there, he called a council, and with a belt of wampum removed the council-fire to Lancaster; to which place they all agreed to go and wait the arrival of Teedyuscung, with the Senecas, Delawares, and Shawanese. He gave a belt to remove the council-fire to Lancaster, and on the 7th of April arrived at Lancaster from John Harris', where a treaty of amity was concluded, to the satisfaction of all concerned it would seem; but the result proved the perfidy of the Indian, who accepted the white man's presents and, returning from the treaty, murdered the unsuspecting settlers.

Notwithstanding the ranging of the troops along the mountains, and the extraordinary measures taken to defend the frontiers, the marauding savages stole through the mountain fastnesses and committed their atrocities. James Galbraith, writing from Derry township under date of 10th of August to the Governor, says,—

"HONORED SIR:

"There is nothing here, almost every day, but murder by the Indians in some parts or other. About five miles above me, at Manada Gap, there were two of the Province soldiers killed and one wounded. There were but three Indians, and they came in among ten of our men and committed the murder and went off safe. The name, or sight of an Indian, makes almost all in these parts tremble; their barbarity is so cruel where they are masters; for, by all appearance, the devil communicates, God permits, and the French pay, and by that the back parts, by all appearance, will be laid waste with flight, with those who are gone and going; more especially Cumberland County.

"Pardon my freedom in this wherein I have done amiss.

"Sir, your most humble servant,
"JAMES GALBRAITH."

Squire Reed, writing from Hanover under date of the 7th of August to Edward Shippen, of Lancaster, gives this account of the foregoing affair,—

"SIR,—Yesterday Jacob Ellis, a soldier of Capt. Smith's, at Brown's, about two miles and a half over the first mountain, just within the Gap, having some wheat growing at that place, prevailed with his officers for some of the men to help him to cut some of the grain; accordingly ten of them went, set gnards and fell to work. At about ten o'clock they had reaped down and went to the head to begin again, and before they had all well begun three Indians, having crept up to the fence just behind them, fired upon them and killed the corporal, and another who was standing with a gun in one hand and a bottle in the other was wounded; his left arm is broken in two places so that his gun fell, he being a little more down the field than the rest. Those who were reaping had their fire-arms about half-way down the field standing at a large tree. As soon as the Indians had fired, and without loading their guns, they leaped over the fence right in amongst the reapers—one of them had left his gun on the outside of the field—they all ran promiscuously while the Indians were making a terrible haloo, and looked more like the devil than Indians. The soldiers made for their fire-arms, and as three of them stood behind the tree with their arms, the Indian that came wanting his gun came within a few yards of them and took up the wounded soldier's gun and would have killed another had not one perceived him, fired at him, so that he dropped the gun. The Indians fled, and in going off, two soldiers standing about a rod apart an Indian ran through between them they both fired at him yet he escaped. When the Indians were over the fence a soldier fired at one of them, upon which he stooped a little; the three Indians escaped. Immediately after leaving the field, they fired one gun and gave a haloo. The soldiers held the one that was killed, went home to the fort, found James Brown, who lives in the fort, and one of the soldiers missing.

"The lieutenant, accompanied by some more, went out and brought in the dead man; but still Brown was missing. Notice was given on that night. I went up next morning with some hands. Capt. Smith had sent up more men from the other fort; these went out next morning; against I got there, word was come in that they had found James Brown, killed and scalped. I went over with them to bring him home. He was killed with the last shot, about twenty rods from the field, his gun, his shoes, and jacket carried off. The soldiers who found him said that they tracked the three Indians to the second mountain, and they found one of the Indian's guns a short distance from Brown's corpse, as it had been not worth much. They showed me the place where the Indians fired through the fence, and it was just eleven yards from the place where the dead man lay. The rising ground above the field was clear of standing timber and the gnubs low, so that they had kept a lookout.

"The above account you may depend on. We have almost lost all hopes of everything, but to move off and lose our crops that we have cut with so much difficulty.

"I am your Honor's servant,
"ADAM REED."

Some time in the latter part of October the Indians again visited Hanover township, where they murdered, under circumstances of much cruelty, several families, among whom was one Andrew Berryhill. On the 22d of October they killed John Craig and his wife, scalped them both, burned several houses, and carried off Samuel Ainsworth, a lad about thirteen years old. The next day they scalped a German, whose name has not been given.

On the 14th of the month Squire Reed addresses a letter to Edward Shippen and others on the situation of affairs in his neighborhood. The transactions mentioned partly occurred in what is now Lebanon County, and we have referred to them in the history thereof, but now give the letter in full :

" Friends and Fellow Subjects :

" I read you in a few lines the melancholy condition of the frontiers of this country. Last Tuesday, the 12th inst., ten Indians came to Noah Frederick while ploughing, killed and scalped him, and carried away three of his children that were with him,—the oldest but nine years old,—and plundered his house, and carried away everything that suited their purpose, such as clothes, bread, butter, a saddle, and a good rifle gun, &c., it being but two short miles to Capt. Smith's fort at Swatara Gap, and a little better than two miles from my house.

" Last Saturday evening an Indian came to the house of Phillip Robinson, carrying a green bush before him, said Robinson's son being on the corner of his fort watching others that were dressing flesh by him; the Indian perceiving that he was observed, fled; the watchman fired, but missed him; this being about three-fourths of a mile from Manady Fort; and yesterday morning, two miles from Smith's Fort at Swatara, in Bethel township, as Jacob Farwell was going to the house of Jacob Meyle to his own, was fired upon by two Indians and wounded, but escaped with his life; and a little after, in said township, as Frederick Hewly and Peter Sample were carrying away their goods in wagons, were met by a parcel of Indians and all killed, lying dead in one place and one man at a little distance. But what more has been done has not come to my ears, only that the Indians were continuing their murders.

" The frontiers are employed in nothing else than carrying off their effects, so that some miles are now waste. We are willing, but not able, without help—you are able, if you be willing (that is, including the lower parts of the county), to give such assistance as will enable us to recover our waste land. You may depend upon it, that, without assistance, we, in a few days, will be on the wrong side of you; for I am now on the frontier, and I fear that by to-morrow night I will be left two miles.

" Gentlemen: Consider what you will do, and don't be long about it; and don't let the world say that we died as fools died! Our hands are not tied, but let us exert ourselves and do something for the honor of our country and the preservation of our fellow-subjects. I hope you will communicate our grievances to the lower part of our county, for surely they will send us help, if they understood our grievances.

" I would have gone down myself, but dare not; my family is in such danger. I expect an answer by the bearer, if possible.

" I am, gentlemen, your very humble servant,

" ADAM REED.

" P.S.—Before ending this away I would mention, I have just received information that there are seven killed and five children scalped alive, but have not the account of their names."

On the 16th of May, 1757, eleven persons were killed at Paxtang by the Indians, and on the 19th of August following fourteen people were killed and taken from Mr. Sankey's congregation, and one man killed near Harris' Ferry. At this period negotiations for peace commenced with the powerful chieftains of the Delaware and Shawanese tribes, when the barbarities of the Susquehanna Indians somewhat abated. But the French and Western Indians still roamed in small parties over the country, committing many depredations.

From the Pennsylvania Gazette, in 1757, we glean the following: " We hear from Lancaster that six persons were taken away by the Indians from Lancaster County on the 17th of August. . . . Since our last we learn from Lancaster that there was nothing but murdering and capturing among them by the Indians; that on the 17th of August one Beatty was killed in Pextan; that the next day James Mackey was murdered in Hanover, and William and Joseph Barnett wounded; that on the same day were taken prisoners a son of James Mackey, a son of Joseph Barnett, Elizabeth Dickey and her child, and the wife of Samuel Young and her child, and that ninety-four men, women, and children were seen flying from their places in one body, and a great many more in smaller parties.' So that it was feared the settlements would be entirely forsaken. . . . Our accounts in general from the frontiers are most dismal; all agree that some of the inhabitants are killed or carried off, houses burned and cattle destroyed daily, and at the same time they are afflicted with severe sickness and die fast. So that in many places they are neither able to defend themselves when attacked nor to run away."

A letter from Hanover township, dated Oct. 1, 1757, says that the neighborhood is almost without inhabitants, and on that day and the day before several persons were killed by the savages in Hanover. On the 25th of November, Thomas Robeson and a son of Thomas Bell were killed and scalped by the Indians in that township; but the Indians immediately went off after committing other murders. The following letter was written to Governor Denny by the commandant at Fort Hunter :

" FORT HUNTER, the 3d of October, 1757.

" May it please your Honor:

" In my coming back from ranging the frontiers, on Saturday, the 3d inst., I heard that the day before, twelve Indians were seen not far from here. As it was late and not knowing their further strength, I thought to go at daybreak next morning, with as many soldiers and battaus men as I could get; but in a short time heard a gun fired off, and running directly to the spot, found the dead body of one William Martin, who went into the woods to pick up chestnuts where the Indians were lying in ambush. I ordered all the men to run into the woods, and we ranged until it got dark. The continued rain we have had hindered me from following them. A number of the inhabitants had come here to assist in pursuing the Indians, but the weather prevented them. There were only three Indians seen by some persons who were sitting before Mr. Hunter's door, and they say all was done in less than four minutes. That same night I cautioned the inhabitants to be on their guard; and in the morning I ranged on this side of the mountain; but the next day, my men being few in number by reason of fourteen of them being sick, I could not be long from the garrison; and it seems to me there is a great number of the enemy on this side of the river.

" The townships of Paxtang and Derry have agreed to keep a guard some time in the frontier houses from Maudsley to Susquehanna, and expect that your Honor will be pleased to reinforce this detachment.

" If these townships should break up the communication between fort Augusta and the inhabitants, they would be greatly endangered.

" I am with great respect, &c.,

" CHRISTIAN BUSSE."

On the 17th of October, as four of the inhabitants near Hunter's Fort were pulling their Indian corn, two of them—Alexander Watt and John McKennet—were killed and scalped, their heads cut off, the other two scalped. Hearing of it Capt. Work, of the Augusta regiment, went down with some men from Fort Halifax, met the savages on Peter's Mountain, about twenty of them, when they fired upon him at about forty yards' distance, upon which his party returned the fire, and put the enemy to flight, leaving behind them five horses, with what plunder they had got; and one of the Indians was supposed to have been wounded by the blood that was seen in their tracks. None of Capt. Work's men were hurt. The newspapers of the period and the State archives are full of these atrocious and brutal murders.

An Indian council was held in Easton in October, 1758, at which the chiefs both of the Six Nations and the Delawares were present, and met the agents of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and George Croghan, the agent of Sir William Johnson. The causes of the late war were fully discussed, complaints of the Indians concerning land were listened to, and all differences amicably adjusted; and a message was sent by the Six Nations ordering the Shawanese and Twigtwees, on the Ohio, to desist from their hostilities on penalty of being attacked by them. Teedyuscung at this treaty received one of those insulting taunts from the Six Nations by which they too often exhibited their national superiority; taunts, however, which were deeply revenged upon the whites in after-years, when the Delawares had thrown off the galling yoke. Teedyuscung supported his station with dignity and firmness, and refused to succumb; and the different Indian tribes at length became reconciled to each other. That treaty in some measure calmed the apprehensions of the people, and for a time the settlers of this region enjoyed a period of rest.

During the war, among the Provincial officers was Rev. Charles Beatty, who was appointed chaplain to one of the Pennsylvania battalions. His journal of the year 1756 contains facts relating to this locality which are to be found nowhere else, and that is our excuse for printing it.

JOURNAL KEPT IN 1756.

"Having received his honor, the Governor's commission to be chaplain to the regiment of foot in the Provincial service under the command of Col. William Clapham, and having the advice and concurrence of the Commission of the Synod, who appointed supplies for the congregation in my absence—set out from home in order to join the regiment at Harris' Ferry, Monday, May 3, 1756. I was accompanied as far as Schuylkill by my elders, and some other friends—and having stopped at a friend's house, not far from the road to refresh myself, reached as far as the sign of the ship on the Lancaster Road, at which I lodged. Felt my need of the Divine presence to be with me in my dangerous or at least difficult undertaking.

"Tuesday, May 4th.—Set off very early in the morning; breakfasted at Rev. Mr. Smith's, at Pequea, who accompanied me as far as Mrs. Callwell's where I parted with my good friend Mr. Daniel McLean, who accompanied me from home thus far. Reached Lancaster in the afternoon—put up at Mr. Saunders'. Col. Clapham and Capt. Lloyd came to see me, and telling me that the Governor was in town, I waited upon his honor in the evening, who received me very kindly. Went to bed early, as I had been wet with the rain on my journey.

"May 5th.—Left Lancaster about ten o'clock, in company with the Governor, colonel, and several other officers and gentlemen, and having dined at B. Hughes', reached Harris' Ferry in the evening. A little after our arrival the soldiers were ordered to attend prayers, but while I was waiting with the Governor and other gentlemen for the men

Harris' house took fire, and the alarm and confusion was such as to prevent public prayer.

"6th.—Had morning prayer. Met with an accident when lifting up poles for a tent, the ridge pole fell and cut me just above the eye, and the blood settled about it.

"Sabbath, 9th.—Preached from Exod. xxxiii. 15. This I thought a proper subject to begin with, as we are going on a very important affair.

"Sabbath, 16th.—Preached twice to a number of country people, as well as to the soldiers, with freedom to myself, and the audience seemed serious, and some impressed.

"Tuesday, 18th.—Preached at Roan's meeting house, in Paxtaug, at the invitation of the people, with liberty and sweetness. The attention of the people engaged and some affected. Called after sermon to see Mr. Elder, but found him not at home.

"Thursday, 20th.—Preached at Yellow Breeches, over Susquehanna, at a meeting house belonging to the Presbytery of Donegal, at the people's invitation. Returned in the evening to camp. One of my pistols went off as I was laying it down, but God be praised, did no hurt.

"Friday, 21st.—This being appointed by the Governor to be kept as a day of Fasting and Prayer—his honor, the Governor, being present, it was generally observed. Preached twice to a great audience, many attending from both sides of the river—in the forenoon from Luke xiii. 3.

"Lord's Day, May 23d.—Preached but once, as the people were engaged.

"Tuesday, 25th.—The Governor left the camp in order to return to Philadelphia, at which the men were drawn up under arms, the cannon fired. Accompanied him with most of the officers belonging to the Regiment, as far as Swatara creek, and returned to camp in the evening. Crossed Susquehanna with my good friend Mr. Armstrong; went as far as Tobias Hendricks', where we lodged, prayed in the family. Next morning conversed with the landlord, who had been sometime sick.

"Wednesday, 26th.—Reached Carlisle; prepared to preach in the evening at the desire of the people, but it raining prevented.

"Thursday.—Preached in the afternoon to a considerable number, with freedom, and had reason to think that it was blessed to some of God's people. Returned to Mr. Armstrong's.

"Friday.—Preached at William Abernethy's. Returned safely in the evening camp.

"Sabbath, May 30th.—Preached twice—in the afternoon to the country people.

"Monday, 21st.—Set off from Harris' in company with Dr. Lloyd and several officers; and a company of men followed. Arrived safely at McKee's store, where we found the Colonel. The reason of our staying so long at Harris' was to get bateaux built to transport our stores and provisions to Shamokin. Had but a poor night's lodging, not having my tent or any bedding.

"June 4th.—Major Burd with the last division of the regiment joined us. Second Lieutenant, George Allen, and forty men, dressed as Indians, sent out as scouts to Shamokin.

"5th.—The Colonel in the afternoon marched with four companies. Reached Foster's, about three miles, where we encamped.

"Sunday, 6th.—Rose early; and after prayers, began our march; halted for breakfast after four miles, then marched on to Armstrong's, where we encamped.

"Monday, 7th.—Began to fell timber for building a Fort 160 feet square, called Fort Halifax.

"Tuesday.—Scouts returned, having gone only 18 miles when they imagined they were discovered and surrounded by the Indians. Many alarms, reports, and detentions.

"Sabbath, 10th.—Preached from Rev. iii. 12. Received a proclamation from the Governor of a cessation of arms against the Indians on the East side of the Susquehanna for 30 days, and at the same time an account of several persons killed and scalped at the forks of Swatara, supposed to be by those Indians discovered at Lee's house on the 8th inst.

"Saturday, 19th.—A number of the soldiers mutinied, chiefly Dutch.

"Sabbath, 20th.—A general court-martial to try the prisoners, most of whom were discharged as innocent. This prevented most of the officers from attending. Preached upon conscience, with a particular application to those who mutinied.

"Friday, 25th.—Ensign Atley came to camp, and brought up under guard two Dutchmen, deserters, who had sacrilegiously mutilated an Indian in his grave.

"Sabbath, 27th.—Were alarmed by the advance guard firing at a mark. The whole regiment were under arms, advanced immediately, expecting to engage every minute, which prevented sermon in the forenoon. So, just as service began in the afternoon, had another alarm, but few, alas!

seemed to regret the disappointment. Wickedness seems to increase in the camp, which gives me a great deal of uneasiness.

"Wednesday, 30th.—Orders were given that all should march the next morning.

"Thursday, July 1st.—Up early to prepare for marching. Desired the Colonel to leave the women behind, according to his promise, especially those of bad character. Accordingly they were all ordered to be paraded, and the Major had orders to leave such as he saw fit behind; but when this came to be done, one of the officers pleaded for one, and another for another, saying that they could wash, &c., so that few were left of a bad character, and these would not stay but followed us that night, and kept with us.

"Friday and Saturday.—Crossed the river by batteaux, officers and men. Then started to march in seven divisions, Indian file, instantly expecting an attack. Before starting had prayer and exhortation."

"Sabbath, 4th.—One of the batteaux which had on it a cannon was upset, which occasioned a great deal of labour, and what profane swearing was there. If I stay in the camp my ears are greeted with profane oaths, and if I go out to shun it, I am in danger of the enemy—what a dilemma is this? But my eyes would be toward the Lord.

"Monday.—Marched twelve or fifteen miles, and saw many traces of the enemy as near at hand. That night under cover of darkness we recrossed the river in batteaux, the Colonel and myself in the first division.

"Tuesday.—The Colonel and Captain Shippen went out in a boat, and from the river saw five Indians in the Fork, and with a glass saw others skulking on the hills. After breakfast and prayers, marched and reached Shamokin about 10 o'clock, and immediately set about securing ourselves by a facine breast-work—fixed our swivels and blind bushes, mounted some of our cannon as well as we could. The situation is fine.

"Wednesday.—The batteaux having been unloaded were sent down to Halifax for the remainder of the stores, under an escort commanded by Lieut. Davis, who was advised to stop on the Islands to prevent surprise by the enemy, signs of whom were seen in every direction.

"Sabbath, 9th.—The camp was alarmed by the hallowing of the cattle, and it was supposed the Indians were driving them off, and a surprise was expected. Two parties were sent out, which recovered eleven of the twenty cattle, but saw 60 Indians. This postponed preaching until after noon.

"Monday.—Capt. Young, the paymaster, arrived from Philadelphia, under an escort of forty men from Halifax, and with alarming accounts from the Governor about the Indians high up the East branch.

"Sunday, the 18th.—Some alarms of Indians, and the going off of Capt. Lloyd's detachment, made a sermon later than usual, and but few of the officers attended. Was enabled to hear a solemn testimony for God against sin and vice in general, and particularly that so common amongst us.

"Friday, July 23d.—This morning very early the scouts, which consisted of about 100 men, dressed like the Indians, some being blacked, others painted, crossed the river into the Fork, in order to go toward the West, with two days' provisions; thus by taking the Indians in their own way, hoped to be able to beat them in their turn. Was grieved that they seemed to have little regard for the blessing of God, which alone can make them successful. Had no inclination to go with them, but they did not seem very desirous of it, and the Colonel thought it best for me to stay, so I took this as a hint of Providence.

"Sabbath, July 25th.—Preached twice to-day—most of the officers attended as well the men. Was enabled to speak with freedom and power. Two men arrived to-day from Philadelphia with a letter that France had declared war against England on the 10th of May.

"Monday, 28th.—The Colonel let me know that if I had a united to go home and see my family, he would grant us leave by a furlough to go with the batteaux to Harris'."

CHAPTER VII.

The French and Indian War (continued)—Gen. Forbes' victory—Conspiracy of Pontiac.

WITH the defeat of the French in Canada, their expulsion from the Ohio by Gen. Forbes, and the erection of Fort Pitt on the ruins of Fort Duquesne, the Province of Pennsylvania looked for the enjoyment of a long and undisturbed peace, since her mild and forbearing policy had conciliated the Indians, and their dangerous neighbors, the French, were removed. But the sources in which they sought for safety were fruitful of dangers. The unprotected state of the frontiers, consequent on the discharge of the forces of the middle and southern colonies, held forth irresistible temptations to the whetted appetite of the border savages for plunder. Their hostility had been rewarded rather than chastised by Pennsylvania; every treaty of peace was accompanied by rich presents, and their detention of the prisoners was overlooked upon slight apologies, though obviously done to afford opportunities for new treaties and additional gifts. The mistaken and perverted humanity of the Quakers had softened down their offenses, and its apologies gave them confidence in their allegations of injuries received from the whites. These reasons, however, are insufficient to account for the wide extension of the Indian confederacy, which was probably caused by motives of profound policy. The aborigines beheld the French driven out of their whole country, themselves threatened by forts commanding the great lakes and rivers, and they felt that an immediate and mighty effort was necessary to restrain the tide, which now, unimpeded, would spread itself over the continent.

For boldness of attempt and depth of design the Pontiac war of 1763, so named by the frontier inhabitants, was perhaps unsurpassed in the annals of border warfare. Schemed by such renowned chiefs, Kiyasuta, head of the Senecas, and Pontiac, of the Ottawas, the numerous tribes lying within the reach of their influence were easily commanded for the prosecution of any new project. Not only in possession of these grand facilities to engage numerous warriors for the present purpose, they availed themselves of additional means to secure a powerful confederacy by calling in aid their eloquence to represent the necessity there was for defense of their own rights in making a deadly repulse against the encroachments of the English colonies, which they represented as having finally in view the hostile displacement or extermination of every Western tribe from the region they now occupied.

The grand scheme projected by these Napoleons of the West seems to have been to arouse the tribes severally of the country, and all those they could reach, to join in striking a decisive blow on the frontiers, and, as it were, throw terror into the very heart of the colonies, and thereby effectually and forever repulse them from encroachments into the valley of the Ohio. A certain day was set apart, it seems, for making the general assault, while the scheme was to be kept in profound silence, that they might come upon their victims in an unguarded hour. All the forts were to be simultaneously attacked, as well as the settlements, and all individuals whom they could come upon, and with one bold sweep, as it were, ~~razed~~ to the earth everything bearing the marks of their doomed enemies. The season of harvest was chosen that the attention of the people might at the time be drawn to their crops, as well as the work of havoc then be greater by their destruction of them.

When the attack was made it was found not to be simultaneous. That on Fort Pitt and vicinity was made almost two or three days before the time agreed upon for the general attack, although it was done with the belief at the time that the day had arrived. The misunderstanding was said to proceed from the officiousness of a Delaware squaw, who was desirous that their plans might be deranged. At the grand council held by all the tribes for the appointment of the day for the general attack and making the necessary arrangements for it a bundle of rods had been put into the hands of every tribe, each bundle containing as many rods as there were days till the day when the general attack was to be made. One rod was to be drawn from the bundle every morning, and when a single one remained it was the signal for the outbreak. The squaw spoken of had purposely extracted two or three rods unknowingly to the others, thinking it might materially disconcert, if not defeat their project. From this circumstance was said to arise the untimely action of the Indians about Fort Pitt. But everywhere else the attack had been simultaneous, so correct and in such concert had they moved.

The Shawanese and Delawares appear to have been the most active, and in pursuance of their bold and bloody project, the moment arriving for the general assault, the first intelligence their fated enemies had of the preconcerted work of death was a murderous attack made upon them without discrimination wherever met with. The frontier settlements of Pennsylvania and the neighboring provinces of Maryland and Virginia were immediately overrun with scalping parties, "marking their way with blood and devastation wherever they went, and all the examples of savage cruelty which never fail to accompany an Indian war."

Almost every fort along the lakes and the Ohio was instantly attacked, and those that did not fall under the first assault were surrounded, and a resolute siege commenced. In a short time, so vigorous were the savages, that eight out of eleven forts were taken,—Venango, Le Bœuf, Presqu'Isle, with the chain of stockades west of the Ohio,—Fort Pitt, Detroit, and Niagara alone maintaining. These, being better garrisoned, were prepared to withstand an attack with but little danger.

After the first panic had passed away the refugee settlers associated themselves together, and, under the care of divisions of the regular troops and militia, succeeded in collecting and saving the remnant of their crops.

During this time Fort Pitt remained in the most hazardous condition. And what may have been its situation already, apprehensions for the worst were entertained, for no accounts from it had been received of late, and in fact nothing definite since it had been attacked, when it had been surrounded by the Indians "and all communication cut off from it even by message." Placed at so great a distance from the inhabited portions of the Province, and rendered still more inaccessible from the then almost impassible mountains that intercepted the way, it could not be conveniently heard from, nor could assistance be rendered it without great expense of labor and time; and a considerable force being requisite for their own safety to undertake a march so distant, some delay could not be avoided. Endeavors in the Province to raise men proving nearly abortive, although the Assembly at the first outbreak of the savages had ordered seven hundred men to be raised for the protection of the frontiers during harvest, yet all attempts now seemed to have little effect. The delay which had thus been occasioned increased the alarm for those at Fort Pitt, from whom no intelligence still was had, while the audacity of depredating parties was increased as they discovered the settlers fleeing before them and no very apparent effort being made to check them.

All exertions proving fruitless to raise the requisite forces, Gen. Amherst, commander-in-chief of the army in America, promptly dispatched Col. Bouquet to the relief of Fort Pitt. Gathering together "the shattered remnants of the Forty-second and Seventy-second Regiments, lately returned from the West Indies," comprising in all scarcely five hundred men, the gallant Bouquet set out for a long and tedious march through the forests. His little army were indeed invalids, "reinforced with the last man that could be removed from the hospital," and many were so infirm that about sixty were conveyed in wagons; but these had been brought along more with a view of being left as reinforcements at the small posts by the way. Accompanying this little force, however, were six companies of rangers from Lancaster and Cumberland Counties, amounting to two hundred, all that could possibly be spared from the Provincial volunteers, who were guarding their own homes from the inroads of the enemy.

Reaching Carlisle, Col. Bouquet found nothing had been done to carry out the orders which had been given to prepare a convoy of provisions on the frontiers. All was terror and consternation; the greatest part of Cumberland County, through which the army had to pass, was deserted, and the roads were covered with distressed families flying from their settlements, and destitute of all the necessaries of life. In the midst of this confusion, says Bouquet in his journal, the supplies required for the expedition became very precarious, nor was it less difficult to procure horses and wagons for the use of the troops. However, in about two weeks after his arrival at Carlisle, by the prudent and active measures pursued by the commander, joined to his knowledge of the country and the diligence of those he employed, the requisite provisions and articles of conveyance were procured, and the army proceeded.

On the 5th of August, Col. Bouquet determined to halt at Bushy Run, now Westmoreland County, and there rest the troops till towards evening, and pass the deep and dangerous defiles of Turtle Creek during the ensuing night; but when within about a half-mile from the creek, the advanced guard of the army was suddenly surprised by an ambuscade of Indians opening a brisk fire of musketry upon them. Being speedily and firmly supported by bringing up the rear, a charge of bayonets was ordered, which effectually routed the savages, when they were pursued a short distance. But no sooner was the pursuit given up than they returned and renewed the attack with redoubled vigor, while at the moment a most galling fire was opened by the parties who had been concealed on some high ground that skirted the flanks of the army. A general charge with the whole line was now made, which proved effective, and the savages were obliged to give way; but withal to no purpose, for no sooner was the pursuit again given up than the Indians renewed the attack with their wonted ferocity. The action continued without intermission the whole afternoon,—a confused and irregular attack by the forces of both parties. The enemy, routed from one skulking-place, would retreat to another. But Col. Bouquet made it an object as much as possible to keep his troops collected, that they might not be broken in upon and dispersed by the enemy. The battle ended with the day, without any decided advantage to either.

With the first dawn of morning the war-whoop was again raised, and in a moment there seemed a thousand startling yells to break in every direction around. At this signal a rush was made by the Indians on all sides, but the lines ready formed were not to be taken by surprise, and effectually repulsed the savages in every attempt. Betaking themselves to the trees, the Indians poured an incessant fire with great precision into the little army. Fatigued with the previous day's march and the battle of the preceding evening, combined with the exposure to a hot August sun, with no water within their reach, the troops began indeed to be dispirited. Attacked with a dogged determination, and fired upon without intercession, they could neither retreat nor proceed. It became obvious, therefore, that a desperate effort must be made to save the army from total destruction. The commander happily bethought himself of a stratagem that might prove successful, which, as the troops were still disposed in a circle from the previous night, consisted in making a manœuvre of the appearance of a precipitate retreat from one side so as to entrap the assailants in pursuit, who would rush as thoughtless within the inclosure of lines which lay in ambush.

The snare was set in direction of the enemy's deadliest fire, and most happily succeeded in enticing them from their places of concealment. Before aware, they were under a most destructive fire of the troops; and ere they could retreat, they received so deadly a charge from the regulars that they fled with the utmost precipitation. This secured the victory. The woods around were immediately abandoned by the others, and the conflict ceased.

This had been the whole Indian force from Fort Pitt, who, after lying around that place for three months, keeping up a vigorous siege, and being on the alert for a force to come against them from the settlements, early became apprised of the approach of Col. Bouquet, and informed duly by their spies of the movement of the enemy, they determined, as was expected, to await them on the most advantageous ground, aware that if they succeeded in defeating the troops, the extent of country they had already gained sway over by their sudden and bold movements would not only be maintained, but a probability follow that they might strike consternation into the very heart of the settlements. It is indeed impossible to say what influence might have been exerted over the settlements of Pennsylvania in particular had this little army been cut off. It is certain possession of the country might not have been regained till the work of destruction had been completed west of the mountains. But so stunning were the results of this battle to the savages, dismay at once seized them and confidence was lost. Though looked upon as a small engagement, there doubtless hung upon it results nigh as important to the colonies as the issue of the more renowned battle on the Plains of Abraham, when a Wolfe and a Montcalm met to decide the destinies of their respective nations. The little battle of Bushy Run was the means of disheartening the Indians and causing them to abandon designs which, if they had continued to execute with the same rigor that had characterized them for a little more than three months since they had commenced the assault, might have effected much that would be fearful to relate.

In this engagement Col. Bouquet lost about fifty men and had sixty wounded, the savages about sixty of their best warriors and many of their most distinguished chiefs. Their forces were made up with warriors from the Delaware, Shawanese, Mingo, Wyandot, Mohican, Miami, and Ottawa tribes, and doubtless the flower of their nations, for the importance of the issue of the first decisive engagement had most likely been well weighed by them, and therefore an effort made for the victory.

The army again pursued their route, and in four days reached Fort Pitt, with but little interruption, except "a few scattering shots from a disheartened and flying enemy." The Indians immediately withdrew and retired beyond the Ohio. Fort Pitt relieved, found its little group of inhabitants again breathing the open air after a constant siege of more than three months, and the uplifted tomahawk and scalping-knife of the red savage was stayed.

CHAPTER VIII.

The French and Indian War (continued)—The so-called "Paxtang Boys' Insurrection"—The Manor of Conestoga—The Conduct of the Provincial Assembly—The Perfidy of the Friendly Indians—Insecurity of the Frontiers from their Maraudings—Destruction of the Indians at Conestoga and Lancaster.

By virtue of a warrant from the commissioners of property, dated "the 1st day of the 12th month (February), 1717-18," there was "surveyed for the proper use and behoof of William Penn, Esq., Proprietary and Governor-in-chief of the Province of Pennsylvania," a tract of land containing sixteen thousand acres, lying on the east side of the Susquehanna River from the mouth of Conestoga Creek northward. This was the Manor of Conestoga. At the date of its survey by the deputy surveyor of Chester County, Isaac Taylor, there were no Indians dwelling within that reservation, and this is a fact which our historians have lost sight of, whether ignorantly or designedly we shall not at this time say. Previous to the laying out of the manor all the Indians had removed higher up the Susquehanna,—the Shawanese to their brethren westward, the Conoys to the Great Island, uniting their destinies with the Six Nations.

A few years later, however, several Indian families located upon the manor on a little stream emptying into the Conestoga near its mouth, about three miles from the Susquehanna, and about five miles south-east of the present town of Columbia. For almost a period of forty years their number was increased or diminished by Indian tramps wandering in the guise of friends among the white settlements, intent on spying out objects for savage cruelty, and claiming to belong to the Conestoga town.

It was during the Pontiac war that the Governor of the Province of Pennsylvania, in reply to the earnest appeals for help and protection, said he could give the frontiersmen no aid whatever, but commends their zeal and urges them to act with caution; while the Assembly paid no heed to the supplications of the distressed inhabitants, and instead of redress and aid, abused and insulted those who asked for protection. One member of that body, Nathaniel Grubb, of Chester Connty, mild and placid Quaker, used this bland-like expression in referring to the "back inhabitants," "A pack of insignificant Scotch-Irish, who, if they were all killed, could well enough be spared." The leading Quakers, who controlled the affairs of the Province of Pennsylvania from 1682 until towards the beginning of the Revolution, when Quaker rule and British supremacy sank to rise no more, were designing political demagogues, and the private correspondence of the Penns themselves are proofs of their duplicity and artfulness.

Neither the Governor of the Province or the controlling power of the Assembly showed the proper spirit. It was at a time when the tomahawk, the scalping-knife, and the torch were desolating the country. The frontier counties became wretched and deplorable beyond description. "The Indians," said the Paxtang volunteers in their "Apology," "set fire to houses, barns, corn, hay, in short, to everything that was combustible; so that ye whole country seemed to be in one general Blaze and involved in one common Ruin. Great Numbers of y^e back Settlers were murdered, scalped, and butchered in the most shocking manner, and their dead Bodies inhumanly mangled," but further details as given by them are too horrid for recital. "None," further say they, "but those who have been spectators or eye-witnesses of these shocking scenes can possibly have any adequate Ideas of our sufferings. Nay, even those very persons who are so hardened and destitute of the common Feelings of Humanity, as to be able to extenuate these horrid Barbarities, under the Charitable Plea of its being their Custom of making war, would we doubt not be softened, had they but shared with us in the lightest parts of our sufferings." Then Paxtang became truly the frontier, for west of the Susquehanna, so great was the terror, that scarcely an inhabitant was left. At this juncture the Rev. John Elder, the long and revered pastor of Paxtang and Derry Churches, organized his rangers, under authority, however, of the government. They were mostly members of his own and Hanover congregations. These brave men were ever on the alert, watching with eagle eye the Indian marauders who, during Pontiac's war, swooped down upon the defenseless frontiers of Cumberland and Lancaster Counties. "High mountains, swollen rivers, or great distances never deterred or appalled them. Their courage and fortitude were equal to every undertaking, and woe betide the red men when their blood-stained tracks once met their eyes." The Paxtang rangers were truly the terror of the red men, swift on foot, excellent horsemen, good shots, skillful in pursuit or in escape, dexterous as scouts, and expert in manoeuvring.

On the 4th of August, 1763, Col. Elder wrote to the Governor, "The service your honor was pleased to appoint me to I have performed to the best of my power, though not with success equal to my desires. However, both companies will, I imagine, be complete in a few days. There are now upwards of thirty men in each, exclusive of officers, who are now and have been employed since their enlistment in such service as is thought most safe and encouraging to the frontier inhabitants, who are here and everywhere else in the back counties quite sunk and dispirited, so that it is to be feared that at any attack of the enemy a considerable part of the country will be evacuated, as all seem inclinable to seek safety rather in flight than in opposing the savage foe."

Unfortunately they were prohibited by law from going over the boundaries of the purchased lands after the enemy, and it is not to be supposed, therefore, they could guard successfully the entire line of outposts.

During the subsequent harvest the reapers of Paxtang, Hanover, and Derry took their guns and ammunition with them into the fields to defend themselves from the sudden attacks of the enemy. On the Sabbath the trusty rifle was taken to the sanctuary, and the pastor of Paxtang had at hand his weapon of defense.

In August, Col. Armstrong, the "hero of Kittanning," with two hundred Paxtang and Hanover rangers and a few soldiers from Cumberland County, marched to the Indian town on the Big Island. While en route, learning that a party of fifty Indians were on their way to the settlements, a portion of the volunteers followed them and routed them on Muncy Hill. The rest of Col. Armstrong's force proceeded to the Indian town, but found it deserted, the Indians having been apprised of the approach of the volunteers. The latter returned home, enraged at learning that the Conestogas had sent messengers to inform their friends of the expedition.

Subsequently, on the 9th of September, 1763, a few of the rangers who had encamped in Berks County were apprised of the approach of the Indians by their out-scouts. The Indians advanced cautiously to take them by surprise. When near, with savage yells, they rushed forward; but the rangers, springing to their feet, shot the three in front. The rest fled into a thicket and escaped. The Indians were armed with guns and provided with ammunition. These Indians were on their way from the Moravian Indians in Northampton County to the Big Island. Runners were sent to the different parties of rangers with information, and others set out in pursuit of those who fled. The rangers who started in pursuit were baffled by the superior skill and artifice of the Indians. That they went to the Big Island was beyond a doubt. The Paxtang band were now determined to watch with scrutinizing eyes the Indians who visited Conestoga and the Moravian towns, and ascertain the treacheries.

The Provincial commissioners, however, on being informed of the foregoing particulars, inquired into the facts with the Governor, and reported the result to the Assembly on the 21st of October: "Upon inquiry made before the Governor into the late conduct of the Moravians and their Indians at Nain and Wichetunk, it was their opinion that the said Indians have been, and still are, secretly supplied by the Brethren with arms and ammunition, which they, the said Indians, having an intercourse with our enemies on the frontiers, do barter and exchange with them, to the great danger of the neighboring inhabitants, and that there is much reason to suspect the said Moravian Indians have also been principally concerned in the late murders committed near Bethlehem, in the county of Northampton, which renders it absolutely necessary to remove them into the interior parts of the Province, where their behavior may be more closely observed. It was ordered by the House of Assembly that the Indians be invited down and lodged at some convenient place, and supported at the public expense. Some were placed in the barracks, others on Province Island."

About the middle of October, when the murder of the Stinson family and others reached the ears of the Paxtang men, they solicited their colonel, the Rev. Mr. Elder, to obtain permission of the Governor to allow them to make an excursion against the enemy. Another object had in view was "to destroy the immense quantities of corn left by the New England men at Wyoming, which, if not consumed, would be a considerable magazine to the enemy, and enable them with more ease to distress the inhabitants." At the most earnest solicitation, therefore, of his men, Col. Elder allowed the companies of Capts. Stewart and Clayton to proceed to Wyoming. They marched in three days and a half one hundred and ten miles on foot. When they reached Wyoming they learned that the bloodthirsty savage had preceded them, entering the valley from the direction of Northampton County, and then taken their departure up the river, murdering all the settlers. Col. Elder, in his letter to Governor Hamilton, was under the impression that, owing to the exposed condition of that region of country, the New England men had fled from the valley. Dispirited and shocked at the Indian atrocities, the rangers, after burying the massacred, burned the Indian houses and a quantity of corn left standing, and returned to their homes.

By what evidence we know not, nor by what power of reasoning, but our Connecticut friends have recently laid the destruction of the New England colonists to the rangers under Stewart and Clayton, the bare supposition of which we can only characterize as infamous. All the documents go to show that the inferences thrown out are the imaginings of an addled brain. Neither Quaker falsehoods or Yankee ingenuity did we ever suppose would go to such lengths.

Indians had been traced by the scouts to the wigwams at Conestoga, and to those of the Moravian Indians in Northampton County. Suspicion was awakened; the questions, "Are these Indians treacherous? Are their wigwams the harbors of our deadly foe? Do they conceal the nightly prowling assassin of the forest, the villain who, with savage ferocity, tore the innocent babe from the bosom of its mother where it had been quietly reposing and hurled it in the fire? The mangled bodies of our friends cry aloud for vengeance." Such were the questions, surmises, and expressions of the exasperated people. The Paxtang rangers were active in endeavoring to discover the perpetrators of those acts of violence, and they succeeded. Their scouts traced the Indian marauders to the Conestoga town. It was not alone the few miserable, squalid wretches who had been caressed and supported by the Quaker government, but strange Indians were there harbored and protected. Capt. Lazarus Stewart, one of the boldest men of the frontiers, who commanded a company of rangers, proposed to Col. Elder to capture the murderers; but the merciful colonel dissuaded him from the attempt. It was then, under date of September 13 (1763), that the Rev. Elder wrote to Governor Hamilton,—

"I suggest to you the propriety of an immediate removal of the Indians from Conestoga, and placing a garrison in their room. In case this is done, I pledge myself for the future security of the frontiers."

Capt. (afterwards Col.) Timothy Green, on the 15th of the same month, wrote to His Excellency,—“We live in daily fear of our lives. At the Indian town the incarnate devils are secreted, and the people here demand that those Indians be removed from among us.”

John Harris had previously made a similar request: “The Indians here I hope your Honor will be pleased to cause to be removed to some other place, as I don't like their company.”

Subsequently, on taking charge of the executive affairs of the Province in October, Governor John Penn replied as follows: “The Indians of Conestoga have been represented as innocent, helpless, and dependent on this government for support. The faith of this government is pledged for their protection. I cannot remove them without adequate cause. The contract made with William Penn was a private agreement, afterwards confirmed by several treaties. Care has been taken by the Provincial Committee that no Indians but our own visit Conestoga. Whatever can be faithfully executed under the laws shall be as faithfully performed.”

This “contract with William Penn” was the excuse given to the Governor by those who controlled the government,—the Quakers,—and the Governor wrote without examining into the truth of the matter. The fact is, as we have heretofore remarked, that the original Indian settlers had removed before the laying out of the Manor of Conestoga, and those who then occupied it were not the possessors of the land, but lived on it simply by sufferance. William Penn had not assigned any land to any Indians on the Conestoga save to the Shawanese, but they had removed westward forty years previously. So much for Governor John Penn's objection, yet a bad excuse sometimes is better than none.

The rangers, finding their appeals to the authorities useless, resolved on taking the law into their own hand. The safety of the frontier inhabitants demanded it, there was no alternative. It was at first decided to capture several of the most notorious and try them by due course of law. This was found to be impossible, as referred to in Capt. Stewart's declaration, which we shall farther on present. The destruction of the Conestogas, so called, was not then projected. That was the result. The capture of the Indians was approved of by Col. Elder, but the attempt failing, as an officer of the Province it was his duty to prevent extreme measures. Parkman and Rupp state that Col. Elder, learning of an attempt to destroy the entire tribe, as they were about to set off rode after them commanding them to desist; that Stewart threatened to shoot his horse, and much more. Such was not the case.

In the first place, no descendant of the Puritans can properly understand the character of the Scotch-Irish, and we must say the same of Mr. Rupp, whose sympathies, learning, and researches were to the German element. Whether these historians were biased in their judgment by Quaker coloring we know not, but true it is, without making due inquiry, authentic records have been cast aside and the willful misinterpretation of Quaker fiction given as current historical truths. From a letter dated Paxtang, Dec. 16, 1763, written to Governor Penn, he says, "On receiving intelligence, the 13th inst., that a number of persons were assembled on purpose to go and cut off the Conestoga Indians, in concert with Mr. Foster, the neighboring magistrate, I hurried off an express with a written message to that party, 'entreating them to desist from such an undertaking, representing to them the unlawfulness and barbarity of such an action, that it's cruel and unchristian in its nature, and would be fatal in its consequences to themselves and families; that private persons have no right to take the lives of any under the protection of the Legislature; that they must, if they proceeded in that affair, lay their accounts to meet with a severe prosecution, and become liable even to capital punishment; that they need not expect that the country would endeavor to conceal or screen them from punishment, but that they would be detected and given up to the resentment of the government.' These things I urged in the warmest terms in order to prevail with them to drop the enterprise, but to no purpose."

Not to be deterred, the rangers reached the Indian settlement before daylight. The barking of some dogs discovered them, and a number of strange Indians rushed from their wigwams, brandishing their tomahawks. This show of resistance was sufficient inducement for the rangers to make use of their arms. In a few moments every Indian present fell before the unerring fire of the brave frontiersmen. The act accomplished, they mounted their horses and returned severally to their homes. Unfortunately, a number of the Indians were absent from Conestoga, prowling about the neighboring settlements, doubtless on predatory incursions. The destruction at the Manor becoming known, they were placed in the Lancaster work-house. Among these vagabonds were two well known to Parson Elder's scouts. In addition, several Indians of notorious character made their way to Philadelphia and were secreted among the Moravian Indians protected in that city.

An express being sent to Philadelphia with the news, great excitement ensued, and Governor Penn issued a proclamation relative thereto. Notwithstanding its fine array of words, it fell upon the Province harmless. Outside of the Quaker settlements, every one heartily approved of the measures taken by the Paxtang rangers.

The presence of the remaining Indians at Lancaster became a cause of great uneasiness to the magistrates and people. Their removal to Philadelphia was earnestly requested by Edward Shippen and others.

Governor Penn proved very tardy, and we are of the opinion he cared little about them, or he would have acted promptly. Day after day passed by, and the excitement throughout the frontiers became greater. The rangers, who found that their work had been only half done, consulted as to what measures should be further proceeded with. Capt. Stewart proposed to capture the principal Indian outlaw, who was confined in the Lancaster work-house, and take him to Carlisle jail, where he could be held for trial. This was heartily approved of, and accordingly a detachment of the rangers, variously estimated at from twenty to fifty, proceeded to Lancaster on the 27th of December, broke into the work-house, and but for the show of resistance would have effected their purpose. But the younger portion of the rangers, to whom was confided this work, were so enraged at the defiance of the Indians, that before their resentment could be repressed the unerring rifle was employed, and the last of the so-called Conestogas had yielded up his life. In a few minutes thereafter, mounting their horses, the daring rangers were safe from pursuit. George Gibson, who, from his acquaintance with the principal frontiersmen of his time, in a letter written some years after, gives the most plausible account of this transaction, which bore such an important part in the early history of the Province. He says, "No murder has been committed since the removal of the friendly Indians and the destruction of Conestoga,—a strong proof that the murders were committed under the cloak of the Moravian Indians. . . . A description of an Indian who had, with great barbarity, murdered a family on the Susquehanna, near Paxtang, was sent to Lazarus Stewart, at Lancaster. This Indian had been traced to Conestoga. On the day of its destruction he was on a hunting expedition. When he heard that the rangers were in pursuit of him he fled to Philadelphia. . . . The three or four who entered the work-house at Lancaster were directed by Stewart to seize on the murderer, and give him to his charge. When those outside heard the report of the guns within, several of the rangers alighted, thinking their friends in danger, and hastened to the door. The more active of the Indians, endeavoring to make their escape, were met by them and shot. No children were killed by the Paxtang boys. No act of savage butchery was committed."

CHAPTER IX.

The "Paxtang Boys" Insurrection (continued)—Excitement in the Province—Characteristic Letter of Parson Elder—The Declaration of the Frontier Inhabitants.

If the excitement throughout the Province was great after the affair at Conestoga, this last transaction set everything in a ferment. "No language," says Rev. Dr. Wallace, "can describe the outcry which arose from the Quakers in Philadelphia, or the excitement which swayed to and fro in the frontiers and in the city." The Quakers blamed the Governor, the Governor the Assembly, and the latter censured everybody except their own inaction. Two proclamations were issued by the Provincial authorities, offering rewards for the seizure of those concerned in the destruction of the Indians, but this was impossible, owing to the exasperation of the frontiersmen, who heartily approved of the action of the rangers.

On the 27th of December the Rev. Mr. Elder hurriedly wrote to Governor Penn, "The storm, which had been so long gathering, has at length exploded. Had government removed the Indians from Conestoga, as was frequently urged without success, this painful catastrophe might have been avoided. What could I do with men heated to madness? All that I could do was done. I expostulated, but life and reason were set at defiance, and yet the men in private life were virtuous and respectable, not cruel, but mild and merciful. . . . The time will arrive when each palliating circumstance will be calmly weighed. This deed, magnified in the blackest of crimes, shall be considered one of those youthful ebullitions of wrath,

To this extenuating and warm-hearted letter came a reply, under date of Dec. 29, 1763, from the Governor: "As it is absolutely necessary, for the preservation of peace and good order in the government, that an immediate stop be put to such riotous proceedings, I beg you will continue to use your best endeavors to discourage and suppress all insurrections that may appear among any of the people over whom you have an influence, and that you will be pleased to take all the pains in your power to learn the names of the ringleaders and perpetrators of those barbarities, and to acquaint me with everything you can discover concerning them. The commissioners, not thinking it necessary any longer to keep in pay more than one person to command the troops on the east side of the Susquehanna, came yesterday to a resolution to discontinue the pay of yourself and Mr. Seeley as commanders of the companies in Lancaster and Berks Counties, which are for the future to be put under the direction of Maj. Clayton, as well as those in Northampton. I therefore desire you will deliver over to him all the Provincial arms, accoutrements, ammunition, and other military stores remaining in your possession, with an exact account of those you have distributed among the two companies. I return you thanks for the good services you have performed, and for the care and prudence with which you have conducted your military command from the beginning."

From the foregoing letter of Governor John Penn it is evident that the commissioners, or rather the Provincial Council, intended to punish both the frontier commanders, or that with the destruction of the Conestogas there was little or no danger of Indian atrocities. The latter proved to be the case, but the authorities were cognizant of the fact that the Paxtang boys were correct in their surmises, and that peace would follow the removal of the friendly Indians. It shows, also, that, believing thus, the Provincial authorities were culpable to a great degree in allowing the Indians to remain on the Manor, despite the representations of Col. Elder, John Harris, and Edward Shippen. The Rev. Mr. Elder quietly laid by his sword, feeling confident that time would vindicate his course.

Subsequently Col. Elder wrote Governor Penn, and from the original letter in our possession we will give what he had to say relative to the then crisis of affairs:

"Sir

"PAXTON 30th Jan^y 1764.

"The Resolution the Commissioners have taken, to put these two Companies under the direction of another person, is very agreeable to me; & in consequence thereof I have on the 24th of this Inst delivered to Major Clayton the military Stores remaining at Mr Harris's with an account of what have been distributed to the Troops, and resigned to him the whole of my military charge.

"I'm greatly obliged to y^r Honor that you have kindly approved of my proceedings in the discharge of the Trust reposed in me; and shall from time to time, use my best Endeavours to promote peace among the people with whom I have any Connections.

"But, I'm much concerned to find that, the rash proceedings of a few inconsiderate persons are likely to be attended with fatal consequences: For, howmuchsoever the facts committed by them, are & have been disliked by the most thinking judicious men; yet the indulgence shown to savages, gives a general disgust: It's thought hard that, any such under the Title of friends, but unjustly, as is commonly thought, shou'd be so much caressed, & such numbers of them taken under the protection of the province, & plentifully suppl'd at It's expense, as an additional weight to the heavy burden it already groans under; while many frontier families, his Majesty's loyal & faithful subjects, are driven from house & home, reduced to poverty and want and little provision made for them; these things, with many others I might mention make a deep impression, & influence the minds of many; but such prudent measures will, I hope, be taken by the Legislature as may happily prevent the ill effects thereof.

"Were it in my power to learn the names of any concerned in the late Riots; I should think it advisable, on many accounts, to use silence in that case: That of an Informer is a Character too odious for a gentleman to bear: Besides the Office I have the honor to be invested with in the Church requires that I shou'd do nothing that may have a tendency to mar my usefulness in that station; but any thing else that may be thought necessary to promote his Majesty's service, or beneficial to the province may at all times be expected from

Some one has indorsed on the back of this letter "Judicious man with noble spirit," with which we heartily coincide.

The first week in January, as had been agreed upon as early as the preceding November, meetings were held in all the frontier counties for the appointment of delegates to go to Philadelphia in person and demand a redress of grievances. Recent events gave interest and zest to the meetings. Paxtang, Donegal, Derry, and Hanover selected each three. Similar delegates were chosen in the non-German townships of Berks County and from Cumberland and Northampton, about forty delegates in all, persons who were not in anywise connected with the transactions at Lancaster or Conestoga. This gathering of the frontiersmen in public meeting to petition and demand of the Provincial Assembly proper redress and representation in that body was stigmatized as seditious and riotous, and hence the "hue and cry" which heralded the contemplated visit of the delegates from the frontier.

Governor John Penn, writing at this time to his uncle, Thomas Penn, at London, a letter which has never appeared in print, gives this view of affairs, it puts a different phase upon passing events: . . . "You will see by the commotion the Province has been in for a long time past, the impossibility of apprehending the murderers of the Conestoga Indians. There is not a man in the county of Lancaster but is of the rioters' party. If we had ten thousand of the king's troops I don't believe it would be possible to secure one of these people. Though I took all the pains I could even to get their names, I could not succeed, for indeed nobody would make the discovery though ever so well acquainted with them, and there is not a magistrate in the country would have touched one of them. The people of this town [Philadelphia], save a certain class, are as inveterate against the Indians as the frontier inhabitants. For it is, beyond a doubt, that many of the Indians now in town [referring to the Moravian Indians on Province Island], have been concerned in committing murders among the back settlers; and I believe, were it not for the few of the king's troops who are here to protect them, that the whole power of the Government would not be able to prevent their being destroyed. Nothing can satisfy these people in flying in the face of Government in the manner they have done, although what they have suffered from these cruel savages is beyond description. Many of them have had their wives and children murdered and scalped, their houses burnt to the ground, their cattle destroyed, and from an easy, plentiful life are now become beggars. In short, this spirit has spread like wild-fire, not only through this Province, but the neighboring Governments, which are fully as inveterate against the Indians as we are. The 14th of this month we suspect a thousand of the rioters in town to insist upon the Assembly granting their request, with regard to the increase of Representatives, to put them upon an equality with the rest of the counties. They have from time to time presented several petitions for the purpose, which have been always disregarded by the House; for which reason they intend to come in person."

And what does Col. Elder say in regard to the expedition to Philadelphia? In writing to Col. Shippen at this time he remarks, "This much may be depended on, that they [the Paxtang men] have the good wishes of the country in general, and that there are few but what are now either one way or the other embarked in the affair."

The Moravian Indians, who had been confined in the barracks at Philadelphia since November, were removed to Province Island at the reported march of "a large body of rioters (?), who were bent on destroying them also." This has been always denied, as merely a wild rumor, which, like many other reports, spread consternation and alarm in the city. The Assembly resolved to resist any attempt to destroy the Indians, but the latter, frightened at the reports of their threatened destruction, petitioned the authorities to send them, a hundred and fifty in number, with their two ministers, to England. But this being impracticable, the Governor furnished them an escort to proceed through New Jersey and New York to Sir William Johnson, under whose protection they were desirous to place themselves. William Franklin, then Governor of New Jersey, granted them a passport; but Governor Colden, of New York, by advice of his Council, refused to admit them within his Province. The Council of New York were offended by Governor Penn sending so large a body of Indians into their colony without their consent, and professed themselves more disposed to punish than to protect the Indians from the east side of the Susquehanna, whom they considered as their worst enemies, composed of the rogues, thieves, and runaways from other Indian nations. They also condemned the policy which returned these men to strengthen their nation. The progress of the Indians being thus obstructed, Gen. Gage, who had succeeded Gen. Amherst in the chief command of the English forces in America, directed two companies of the Royal Americans to re-escort them to Philadelphia, where they were secured in the barracks.

The "Declaration" adopted to be transmitted to Philadelphia is herewith given,—

"We, Matthew Smith and James Gilson, in behalf of ourselves and his Majesty's faithful and loyal subjects, the inhabitants of the frontier counties of Lancaster, York, Cumberland, Berks, and Northampton, humbly beg leave to remonstrate and lay before you the following grievances which we submit to your wisdom for redress.

"First. We apprehend that as Freemen and English subjects, we have an indisputable title to the same privileges and immunities with his Majesty's other subjects who reside in the interior counties of Philadelphia, Chester, and Bucks, and, therefore, ought not to be excluded from an equal share with them in the very important privilege of legislation; nevertheless, contrary to the Proprietor's charter and the acknowledged principles of common justice and equity, our five counties are restrained from electing more than two Representatives, viz., four for Lancaster, two for York, two for Cumberland, one for Berks, and one for Northampton, while the three counties and City of Philadelphia, Chester, and Bucks, elect twenty-six. This we humbly conceive is oppressive, unequal, and unjust, the cause of many of our grievances, and an infringement of our natural privileges of Freedom and equality; wherefore, we humbly pray that we may be no longer deprived of an equal number with the three aforesaid counties to represent us in Assembly.

"Secondly. We understand that a bill is now before the House of Assembly, wherein it is provided that such persons as shall be charged with killing any Indians in Lancaster county, shall not be tried in the county where the fact was committed, but in the counties of Philadelphia, Chester, or Bucks. This is manifestly to deprive British subjects of their known privileges, to cast an eternal reproach upon whole counties, as if they were unfit to serve their country in the quality of jurymen, and to contradict the well-known laws of the British nation in a point whereon life, liberty, and security essentially depend, namely, that of being tried by their equals in the neighborhood where their own, their accusers, and the witnesses' character and credit, with the circumstances of the fact, are best known, and instead thereof putting their lives in the hands of strangers, who may as justly be suspected of partiality to the frontier counties can be of prejudices against Indians; and this, too, in favor of Indians only, against his Majesty's faithful and loyal subjects. Besides, it is well known that the design of it is to comprehend a fact committed before such a law was thought of. And if such practices were tolerated, no man could be secure in his most valuable interest. We are also informed, to our great surprise, that this bill has actually received the assent of a majority of the House, which we are persuaded could not have been the case, had our frontier counties been equally represented in Assembly. However, we hope that the Legislature of this Province will never enact a law of so dangerous a tendency, or take away from his Majesty's good subjects a privilege so long esteemed sacred by Englishmen.

"Thirdly. During the late and present Indian war, the frontiers of this Province have been repeatedly attacked and ravaged by skulking parties of the Indians who have, with the most savage cruelty, murdered men, women and children without distinction, and have reduced near a thousand families to the most extreme distress. It grieves us to the very heart to see such of our frontier inhabitants as have escaped savage fury with the loss of their parents, their children, their wives, or relatives, left destitute by the public, and exposed to the most cruel poverty and wretchedness, while upwards of an hundred and twenty of these savage barbarians, who are with great reason suspected of being guilty of these horrid barbarities, under the mask of friendship, have procured themselves to be taken under the protection of the government, with a view to elude the fury of the brave relatives of the murdered, and are now maintained at the public expense. Some of these Indians, now in the barracks of Philadelphia, are confessedly a part of the Wyandish Indians, which tribe is now at war with us, and the others are the Moravian Indians, who, living with us under the cloak of friendship, carried on a correspondence with our known enemies on the Great Island. We cannot but observe with sorrow and indignation that some persons in this Province are at pains to extenuate the barbarous cruelties practiced by these savages on our murdered brethren and relatives, which are shocking to human nature, and must pierce every heart but that of the hardened perpetrators or their abettors; nor is it less distressing to hear others pleading that although the Wyandish tribe is at war with us, yet that part of it which is under the protection of the government may be friendly to the English and innocent. In what nation under the sun was it ever the custom that when a neighboring nation took up arms, not an individual should be touched, but only the persons that offered hostilities? Who ever proclaimed war with a part of a nation and not with the whole? Had these Indians disapproved of the perfidy of their tribe, and been willing to cultivate and preserve friendship with us, why did they not give notice of the war before it happened, as it is known to be the result of long deliberations, and a preconcerted combination among them? Why did they not leave their tribe immediately, and come among us before there was ground to suspect them, or war was actually waged with their tribe? No, they stayed amongst them, were privy to their murders and revenges, until we had destroyed their provisions, and when they could no longer subsist at home, they come, not as deserters, but as friends, to be maintained through the winter, that they may be able to scalp and butcher us in the spring.

"And as to the Moravian Indians, there are strong grounds at least to suspect their friendship, as it is known they carried on a correspondence with our enemies on the Great Island. We killed three Indians going from Bethlehem to the Great Island with blankets, ammunition, and provisions, which is an undeniable proof that the Moravian Indians were in confederacy with our open enemies; and we cannot but be filled with indignation to hear this action of ours painted in the most odious and detestable colors, as if we had inhumanly murdered our guides, who preserved us from perishing in the woods, when we only killed three of our known enemies, who attempted to shoot us when we surprised them. And, besides all this, we understand that one of these very Indians is proved, by the oath of Stinson's widow, to be the very person that murdered her husband. How, then, comes it to pass that he alone of all the Moravian Indians should join the enemy to murder that family? Or can it be supposed that any enemy Indians, contrary to their known custom of making war, should penetrate into the heart of a settled country to burn, plunder, and murder the inhabitants, and not molest any houses in their return, or ever be seen or heard from? Or how can we account for it that no ravages have been committed in Northampton County since the removal of the Moravian Indians, when the Great Cove has been struck since? These things put it beyond doubt with us that the Indians now at Philadelphia are his majesty's perfidious enemies, and, therefore, to protect and maintain them at the public expense while our suffering brethren on the frontiers are almost destitute of the necessities of life, and are neglected by the public, is sufficient to make us mad with rage, and tempt us to do what nothing but the most violent necessity can vindicate. We humbly and earnestly pray, therefore, that those enemies of his majesty may be removed as soon as possible out of the Province.

"Fourthly. We humbly conceive that it is contrary to the maxims of good policy, and extremely dangerous to our frontiers, to suffer any Indians, of what tribe soever, to live within the inhabited parts of this Province while we are engaged in an Indian war, as experience has taught us that they are all perfidious, and their claim to freedom and independency put it in their power to act as spies, to entreat and give intelligence to our enemies, and to furnish them with provisions and warlike stores. To this fatal intercourse between our pretended friends and open enemies, we must ascribe the greatest of the ravages and murders that have been committed in the course of this and the last Indian war. We, therefore, pray that this grievance be taken under consideration and remedied.

"Fifthly. We cannot help lamenting that no provision has been hitherto made, that such of our frontier inhabitants as have been wounded in defense of the Province, their lives and liberties, may be taken care of, and cured of their wounds at the public expense. We, therefore, pray that this grievance may be redressed.

"Sixthly. In the late Indian war this Province, with others of his Majesty's colonies, gave rewards for Indian scalps, to engage the seeking them in their own country, as the most likely means of destroying or reducing them to reason, but no such encouragement has been given in this war, which has damped the spirits of many brave men, who are willing to venture their lives in parties against the enemy. We, therefore, pray that public rewards may be proposed for Indian scalps, which may be adequate to the dangers attending enterprises of this nature.

"Sevently. We daily lament that numbers of our nearest and dearest relatives are still in captivity among the savage heathen, to be trained up in all their ignorance and barbarity, or to be tortured to death with all the contrivances of Indian cruelty, for attempting to make their escape from bondage; we see they pay no regard to the many solemn promises they have made to restore our friends who are in bondage amongst them. We, therefore, earnestly pray that no trade may hereafter be permitted to be carried on with them until our brethren and relatives are brought home to us.

"Eightly. We complain that a certain society of people in this Province, in the late Indian war, and at several treaties held by the King's representatives, openly loaded the Indians with presents, and that J. P., a leader of the said society, in defiance of all government, not only abetted our Indian enemies, but kept up a private intelligence with them, and publicly received from them a belt of wampum, as if he had been our Governor, or authorized by the King to treat with his enemies. By this means the Indians have been taught to despise us as a weak and dissipated people, and from this fatal source have arose many of our calamities under which we groan. We humbly pray, therefore, that this grievance may be redressed, and that no private subject be hereafter permitted to treat with, or carry on a correspondence with, our enemies.

"Ninthly. We cannot but observe with sorrow, that Fort Augusta, which has been very expensive to this Province, has afforded us but little assistance during this or the last war. The men that were stationed at that place neither helped our distressed inhabitants to save their crops, nor did they attack our enemies in their towns, or patrol on our frontiers. We humbly request that proper measures may be taken to make that garrison more serviceable to us in our distress, if it can be done.

"N B.—We are far from intending any reflection against the commanding officer stationed at Augusta, as we presume his conduct was always directed by those from whom he received his orders.

"Signed on behalf of ourselves, and by appointment of a great number of the frontier inhabitants.

"MATTHEW SMITH.
"JAMES GIBSON.

"FEBRUARY 13th, 1764."

The declaration, it will be perceived, is the Paxtang boys' defense of the affair at Conestoga. They begin by professing to be, to a man, loyal subjects of the king. They state at length the unwarrantable favor shown to the Indians; reiterate their opinion that they are spies and murderers, and state, as the great grievance, which showed the animus of all the rest, that when in the preceding summer Col. Bouquet's forces marched through the Province, almost as a forlorn hope, to defend the frontiers and save Fort Pitt, and when Gen. Amherst, the royal commander-in-chief, demanded assistance, provisions, etc., the Assembly of Pennsylvania did not "stir hand or foot," did not furnish a man, provisions, or assistance of any kind, yet that the moment Indians were in distress they were helped by the authorities and influential men. That every abomination committed by Indians was excused, and that they were encouraged and protected while cutting the throats of the borderers, and then, when at last deserted by the government the frontiersmen had protected themselves, and after fighting the Indians every other way, had at last cut off the source of their calamities, a price was set upon the heads of those who defended their country, their children, and their firesides, and so they conclude, "God save the King!"

CHAPTER X.

The "Paxtang Boys' Insurrection" (continued)—The Approach of the Delegates to Philadelphia—The Fears of the Quaker Metropolis—The Conduct of the Quakers and Dr. Franklin—The Pamphleteers.

ON the afternoon of Saturday, the 5th of February, reports reached Philadelphia that the frontier settlers were coming en masse to Philadelphia, "their principal object," say Quaker historians, "being to put all the Indians confined in the new barracks to death." Some declared there were thousands of the invaders on the march. Without ascertaining the truth of the various exaggerated rumors which reached the Governor's ears, that functionary called a public meeting at the State House (Independence Hall) the same evening. The weather was rainy, but there were some three thousand persons present. Many were expected who did not attend. Those who were absent were principally the Germans, which, according to the Rev. Henry Muhlenberg, gave the Governor much chagrin, and led him to suspect that the Germans "were about to place their heads under the same hood with the discontented or rebels, so-called," terming thus the brave frontiersmen. At this meeting the act which passed the Assembly on the previous day, extending the Riot Act of George I., Chap. I., to the Province of Pennsylvania, was proclaimed, and proposals were at once made for the enrollment of one hundred and fifty gentlemen to assist the soldiers in guarding the barracks that night; also that upon any alarm in the night, bells should be rung, upon which the inhabitants were expected to turn out with their arms, and repair to the barracks, or, if the town was attacked, of which there seemed to be a general fear on the part of the Quakers, to meet at the Court-House, and take measures to defend the city. Four cannon and ammunition were sent from the State-House to the barracks, carpenters were employed to erect works there, and spies were sent out upon the different roads to watch the movements of the Paxtang boys.

The next day was Sunday; but the weather being fine, though very cold, vigorous means of defense were made. A redoubt was built in the centre of the parade at the barracks in the Northern Liberties, and fortified the gate-ways with angles of thick planks, which had places left for the soldiers to fire through. Several pieces of cannon were likewise hauled up, and the best preparations made that the time would admit of. The excitement was intense, and Philadelphia Quakers never desecrated the Lord's Day before or since with such warlike preparations.

Towards midnight of Sunday an express arrived bringing an account of the approach of the Paxtang boys, and another about two o'clock. The alarm was forthwith given by the ringing of bells and the beating of drums. The inhabitants arose from all quarters, and ran to obey the summons. The remains of an old artillery company were mustered, and two pieces of cannon brought from the magazine and stationed before the court-house. All business was suspended, the shops and stores were closely shut, and every person seemed anxious to know what would be the issue of all this tumult. The number of persons in arms that morning was about six hundred, and it was expected that the so-called "rioters" would attempt to cross at the middle and upper ferries of the Schuylkill. Orders were sent to bring the boats to the city side and take away the ropes. Couriers were now seen continually coming in, their horses all of a foam, and the people running with the greatest eagerness to ask them where the enemy was and what were their numbers. The answers to these questions were various. Sometimes they were at a distance. Sometimes they were a thousand strong, then five hundred, then fifteen hundred. In short, all was doubt and uncertainty.

The call to arms was responded to in a manner which had not been expected, many of the Quakers joining in the companies. "It seemed almost incredible," writes the Rev. Mr. Muhlenburg in his diary, "that several young and old Quakers formed companies and took up arms, particularly so to the boys on the streets, for a whole crowd of boys followed a distinguished Quaker, and in astonishment cried out, 'Look here! a Quaker with a musket on his shoulder.' It was by many people looked upon as a wonderful sign to see so many old and young Quakers marching about with swords and guns, or deadly weapons, so called. What increased the wonder was that the pious lambs in the long French, Spanish, and Indian wars had such tender consciences, and would sooner die than raise a hand in defense against those dangerous enemies, and now at once, like Zedekiah, with iron horns, rushing upon a handful of our poor, distressed, and ruined fellow-citizens of the frontiers." This, bear in mind, is the language of an intelligent Lutheran clergyman.

The boats at the Schuylkill ferries near the city had been secured and guards placed at them, but it was afterwards recollected that the ferry-boat of the Swede's Ford had been neglected. This was of great importance, for the river being high at the time, the securing of that boat would have obliged the Paxtang men to march some distance up the river before they could cross. A party therefore immediately set off for that ferry, but they were too late, for the delegates had crossed the stream and proceeded to Germantown.

During the confusion and alarm which prevailed at the time the Paxtang force were momentarily expected to arrive, a circumstance occurred which came near producing a fatal result, and we allude to it in this place from the fact that it subsequently became one of the subjects for satire and caricature. A large body of mounted men appeared at the upper end of Second Street, and the cry was instantly raised, "The Paxtang boys are coming! the Paxtang boys are coming!" The peaceable Quaker military primed their muskets, the artillerymen threw themselves into order, and the people ran to get out of danger. A troop of armed men on horseback were seen coming down the street, and on their approach one of the artillerymen was just applying the match to his gun when a person near by, discovering the mistake, quickly placed his hat over the touch-hole and prevented the discharge. A most unfortunate result was thus avoided, for the approaching troop proved to be a company of butchers and porters who had collected and organized themselves to aid in the defense of the city, but who had neglected to give the proper notice of their coming.

Bearing the declaration, approved of and recommended by over fifteen hundred of the frontier inhabitants, with letters from prominent personages, the delegates, mostly on horseback, pursued their march to the Quaker city, little imagining the warlike preparations to receive them. They sent word to Governor Penn of the hour they would be at Germantown. On their arrival at that place did they have the first intimation of the action taken by the mild and peaceful Quakers? There they halted.

We are of the opinion that after all the Paxtang Boys were not such terrible bugaboos, for we have it from the journal of a Moravian minister (not by any means biased in their favor) that "a large number of persons went from the city to view them, and from the best accounts that could be obtained their number did not exceed one hundred, although it was inferred their whole force had not come in yet. This dreaded body of frontiersmen consisted of a fine set of fellows dressed in blanket coats and moccasins. They were armed with rifles, and some few had pistols. They behaved very well in Germantown, talked civilly to the people, and expressed great surprise that arms had been taken up against them, for they had only come to lay their grievances before the people." Now this is a contemporary account.

At Germantown, the Paxtang men were met by commissioners sent out by Governor Penn, to whom they made known their intentions. Col. Matthew Smith and James Gibson accompanied the commissioners to Philadelphia, where they met the Governor and the Assembly, to whom they presented their grievances in the declaration alluded to, which the latter body term in their minutes the declaration of the rioters, and the petition of the back inhabitants. In the mean time, with a few exceptions, the remaining delegates returned to their homes, and the inhabitants of the city to their peaceful avocations. And thus ended the "Paxtang Boys' Insurrection."

The publications which followed the so-called "Paxtang Boys' Insurrection" were numerous, and no transaction from the founding of the Province to the present day takes up as large a share of the bibliography of Pennsylvania. Some of the pamphlets on both sides were bitter and vindictive. The Quakers took up the pen to hold up the deed to execration, and, to be candid, neither truth nor decency were held in regard. Others seized the opportunity to defame the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians as ignorant bigots and lawless marauders. The Presbyterians, as a matter of course, were not to be kept quiet. On the side of the Quakers were chiefly Israel Pemberton, Benjamin Franklin, and Joseph Galloway; on the popular side, or that of the Paxtang Boys, were Rev. John Ewing, Rev. Gilbert Tennent, and Dr. Dove.

Dr. Franklin seems to have taken the lead with his "Narrative of the Late Massacre of Indians in Lancaster County," etc., a pamphlet which we can characterize in no milder terms than an ingenious fabrication. Among the great men of America, next to Washington, we have ever placed that eminent Pennsylvania statesman whose reputation is cosmopolitan,—the sage and philosopher, Benjamin Franklin. Nevertheless, he was but human, and if we repeat in plain terms that, like many another great man, he had his faults, and pandered to political demagogism, we hope not to lessen him in the reader's estimation. But in the light of history and of this very transaction which is brought to their attention, we cannot pass over his glaring faults. His object in writing the pamphlet is better given in his own words. In the "Memoirs of Lord Kames" appears a letter from Franklin, under date of June 2, 1765, and from London:

"MY DEAR LORD:

"... In December, 1763, we had two insurrections of the back inhabitants, by whom twenty poor Indians were murdered, that had from the first settlement of the Province lived among us under the protection of our government. This gave me a great deal of trouble, for as the rioters threatened further mischief, and their actions were approved by an increasing party, I wrote a pamphlet entitled 'A Narrative of the Late Massacre in Lancaster County of a Number of Indians, Friends of this Province' (Penn.), to strengthen the hands of a weak government by rendering the proceedings of the rioters unpopular and odious. I had by this made myself many enemies among the people, and the Governor, thinking it a favorable opportunity, joined the whole weight of the Proprietary interest to keep me out of the Assembly, which was accordingly effected at the last election.

"Yours, etc.,

"B. FRANKLIN."

Had Franklin made this acknowledgment during his lifetime at home, where the "Narrative" had been freely circulated as an electioneering document, we should have had a higher opinion of the philosopher. It is this document which for a hundred years has furnished food for historians of a sensational turn of mind. As to its general untruthfulness, Franklin's own acknowledgment is sufficient evidence.

Following the "Narrative" came the Rev. Dr. Ewing's "Conduct of the Paxtang Men Impartially Represented," which roused up all the Quaker bigotry and animosity with "An Answer to the Pamphlet, 'Conduct of the Paxtang Men Impartially Represented,' wherein the Ungenerous Spirit of the Author is Manifested, etc., and the Spotted Garment plucked off." Then followed "The Quaker Unmasked, or Plain Truth;" that by "Remarks on the Quaker Unmasked, or Plain Truth to be Plain Falsehood," and "The Author of the Quaker Unmasked Stript Stark Naked, or the Delineated Presbyterian Played Hob with." The latter by "Remarks upon the Delineated Presbyterian Played Hob with, or Clothes for a Stark Naked Author," and that by "A Looking-Glass for Presbyterians." Then came "The Paxtang Boys, a Farce, translated from the original French by a native of Dunnegal;" and "A Scene in the First Act of the New Farce, published as a specimen, printed in the year of the New Hegira Secundus, the Paxtonian Expedition." "The Paxtoniade, by Christopher Gymnast," followed with "A Battle! A Battle! A Battle! A Squirt!

Where no man is killed, and no man is hurt . . ."

to which is added the Quaker's Address versify'd, and King Wampum, or, Harm Watch, Harm Catch!

"'Tis safe and common in a Friend's disguise
To mask Hypocrisy, Deceit, and Lies;
As safe and common as the thing might be,
The Poet thought it was rank Villainy!"

"Printed and sold at the Blue Nose, near Brazen Nose College." King Wampum was the nick-name of Israel Pemberton.

These titles may give some idea of the virulence of the pamphleteers.

In addition to the pamphlets appeared a large number of broad-side caricatures. Among these was a large copper-plate engraving entitled "The Paxtang Expedition," "inscribed to the author of the Farce by H. D." It represented a scene at the courthouse (located at Market and Second Streets). Four pieces of cannon are placed in position, two pointing down Second Street and two up Second Street. The troop of butchers are represented, and the cannoniers are ready to fire. On the sides of the market-stalls companies are represented with arms. The courthouse steps are crowded; a company is drawn up on the south side of Market Street in front of the Quaker meeting-house; armed men occupy the yard of this peaceful conventicle, and others are in the door-way and at the upper windows. From the mouth of one of those below proceeds a label with the words "Success to the new barracks," while those up-stairs proclaim "Bring the grog up stairs." A great number of labels containing exclamations and remarks proceed from the mouths of various persons. Probably one hundred figures are engraved upon this curious picture, which has some verses below descriptive of the scene.

Another caricature is divided into three compartments. On one side is a representation of Israel Pemberton embracing an Indian squaw. In the middle a company of Quakers are under arms, with a cannon pointed towards the Paxtang boys in the distance. Beneath this picture are the lines,—

"When danger is threatened, 'tis mere nonsense

To talk of such a thing as conscience,

To arms! to arms! with one accord,

The sword of Quakers and the Lord;

Fill bumpers, then, of rum or arrack,

We'll drink success to our new barrack!"

On the left of the plate is a representation of Benjamin Franklin in his study, with the inscription,— "Fight dog, fight bear, you're all my friends,

By you I shall attain my ends;
For I can never be content
Till I have got the Government;
But if from this attempt I fall,
Then let the Devil take you all!"

A third caricature represents the author of the "Narrative" (Dr. Franklin) on the left of the picture, the scene being a wild one in the country, intended for the frontiers. In his hand Franklin holds a paper having on it, "Resolved, ye Prop'r a knave and tyrant. N. C. D. Gov'r do. (ditto)." A Quaker is approaching him, riding on the back of a Scotch-Irishman, who carries a gun. The Quaker holds a rope, which is fastened around the neck of a German, who is blindfolded. Upon his back is mounted an Indian with a tomahawk; upon the back of the latter is strapped a bale of furs marked J. P. (Israel Pemberton). In the foreground lie the bodies of murdered settlers, and in the background are deserted farm-houses. The inscription beneath is,—

"The German bleeds and bears the furs
Of Quaker lords and savage curs;
The Hibernian frets with new disaster,
And kicks to flog his broad-brimmed master;
But help at hand resolves to hold down
The Hibernian's head or tumble all down."

Another caricature represented Israel Pemberton in the act of distributing tomahawks to Indians from a cask, while still another, "Humbly Inscribed to the Saturday Night's Club in Lodge Alley," contained about one hundred and fifty lines, principally abusing the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians. Two advertisements were at the bottom, one of "a curry-comb for the itch," the other of "an ointment of brimstone and butter."

CHAPTER XI.

The "Paxtang Boys' Insurrection" (continued)—Reward for Capt. Lazarus Stewart—His Eloquent Declaration—A Summary of the Affair.

GOVERNOR JOHN PENN, from the papers placed in his hands and the representations made by Edward Shippen, the chief magistrate at Lancaster, was disposed to let the whole matter pass into oblivion, but the majority of the Assembly was of a different opinion, and urged him to have Stewart arrested and brought to Philadelphia for trial. Capt. Stewart had repeatedly offered to go to Lancaster or York for trial, but the Quakers demanded otherwise. For five years Stewart resided at Paxtang secure from arrest, but to cajole the Assembly, in 1769, the Governor consented to offer a reward for his capture, giving the matter into the hands of the sheriff of York County. It was then that he sent forth his declaration:

Capt. Lazarus Stewart's Declaration.

"Let all hear! Were the counties of Lancaster, York, Cumberland, Berks, and Northampton protected by government? Did not John Harris, of Paxtang, ask advice of Col. Croghan, and did not the colonel advise him to raise a company of scouts, and was not this confirmed by Benjamin Franklin? And yet, when Harris asked the Assembly to pay the scouting party, he was told 'that he might pay them himself.' Did not the counties of Lancaster, York, Cumberland, Berks, and Northampton, the frontier settlements, keep up rangers to watch the motions of the Indians, and when a murder was committed by an Indian, a runner with the intelligence was sent to each scouting party, that the murderer or murderers might be punished? Did we not brave the summer's heat and the winter's cold and the savage tomahawk, while the inhabitants of Philadelphia, Philadelphia County, Bucks, and Chester 'ate, drank, and were merry?"

"If a white man kills an Indian it is a murder far exceeding any crime upon record; he must not be tried in the county where he lives, or where the offense was committed, but in Philadelphia, that he may be tried, convicted, sentenced, and hung without delay. If an Indian kill a white man it was the act of an ignorant heathen, perhaps in liquor; alas, poor innocent! he is sent to the friendly Indians that he may be made a Christian. Is it not a notorious fact that an Indian who treacherously murdered a family in Northampton County was given up to the magistrates that he might have a regular trial; and was not this Indian conveyed into Bucks County, and is he not provided with every necessary and kept secured from punishment by Israel Pemberton?"

"Have we not repeatedly represented that Conestoga was a harbor for prowling savages, and that we were at a loss to tell friend or foe, and all we asked was the removal of the Indians? Was not this promised by Governor Penn, yet delayed? Have we forgotten Renatus, that Christian (?) Indian?"

"A murder of more than savage barbarity was committed on the Susquehanna; the murderer was traced by the scouts to Conestoga; he was demanded, but the Indians assumed a warlike attitude, tomahawks were raised, and the fire-arms glistened in the sun; shots were fired upon the scouts, who went back for additional force. They returned, and you know the result: Conestoga was reduced to ashes. But the murderer escaped. The friendly and unfriendly were placed in the work-house at Laucaster. What could secure them from the vengeance of an exasperated people? The doors were forced and the hapless Indians perished.

"Were we tamely to look on and see our brethren murdered, our fairest prospects blasted, while the inhabitants of Philadelphia, Philadelphia County, Bucks, and Chester slept and reaped their grain in safety?"

"These hands never shed human blood. Why am I singled out as an object of persecution? Why are the blood-hounds let loose upon me? Let him who wished to take my life, let him come and take it,—I shall not fly. All I ask is that the men accused of murder be tried in Lancaster County. All I ask is a trial in my own county. If these requests are refused, then not a hair of those men's heads shall be molested. Whilst I have life you shall not either have them or me on any terms. It is true, I submitted to the sheriff of York County, but you know too well that I was to be conveyed to Philadelphia like a wild felon, manacled, to die a felon's death. I would have scorned to fly from York. I could not bear that my name should be marked by ignominy. What I have done was done for the security of hundreds of settlers on the frontiers. The blood of a thousand of my fellow-creatures called for vengeance. I shed no Indian's blood. As a ranger I sought the post of danger, and now you ask my life. Let me be tried where prejudice has not prejudged my case. Let my brave rangers, who have stemmed the blast nobly and never flinched, let them have an equitable trial; they were my friends in the hour of danger, to desert them now were cowardice.

"What remains is to leave our cause with our God and our guns.

"LAZARUS STEWART."

Brave and defiant ranger! Words which thrill the soul and fire the heart even to-day, coming down through the cathedral aisles of time for over a century with all its pathos and its eloquence.

The strife at Wyoming between the Connecticut settlers and Pennsylvania gave Stewart and his rangers an opportunity not only to gratify their love of adventure, but for their more perfect security and to show their hostility to the Proprietary government. The democratic tendencies of the Susquehanna Company and the vesting of the title of lands in the occupants of the soil had strong attractions for men of Stewart's cast of mind. In December, 1769, Stewart¹ went to Connecticut to negotiate with the Susquehanna Company. In consideration of certain lands he proposed to unite his forces with those of the company and effect the occupation and settlement of Wyoming. The proposition was accepted. He returned to Paxtang and informed his comrades that he had obtained the grant of a township of land for himself and them, provided they would settle thereon and defend the soil.

behind. Cattle, horses, and sheep were driven to the markets on the Delaware, and their grain-fields plundered and destroyed.

This state of affairs aroused the settlers to active and earnest efforts to recover possession of their homes and property. In their extremity they made overtures to the Paxtang boys to come and join them in recovering possession, promising them a township of land to the fifty who should join them at Wyoming on or before the 1st of February, 1770. The proposition was accepted, the Paxtang boys came on as agreed.

Again the opposing forces met in battle array, the settlers being reinforced from Connecticut and well provided with arms and ammunition, and having the Paxtang boys as their allies.

After a protracted struggle, in which Maj. Durkee commanded on the side of the settlers, and Capt. Ogden on the side of the invaders, Ogden was compelled to surrender, and articles of capitulation were entered into on the 29th April, 1770.

Thus by the aid of the Paxtang boys the settlers recovered possession of their homes, and the Paxtang boys obtained the township of Hanover for their services, where they settled and became a component part of the settlers of the valley, and took part in all the subsequent struggles to retain possession.

The following is the reply of the committee of the company to the application of the Paxtang men:

"COLONY OF CONNECTICUT,

"WINDHAM, Jan. 15, 1770.

"GENTLE'N,—We received a letter some time ago directed to Major John Durkee wherein it was proposed by John Montgomery, Lazarus Young, and others, that as we have been so unjustly treated, in removing our settlers off from the Wyoming lands, that if we would give unto the said Montgomery, Young, and their Associates, to the number of Fifty, a township of land, six miles square, in our purchase, All some suitable and commodious place, that the said Montgomery &c. to the number of Fifty, would immediately enter on our lands at Wyoming, Take Care of our houses and effects, and with our people that are their, and as such as shall from Time to Time joya them on said land, and hold possession of those lands with us. We have with the advice of a large Comtee of said Company considered of sd proposal, and do in behalf of ourselves and the Susquehanna purchase, agree to, and with the said Montgomery, Young, and their associates, to the number of Fifty, that they shall have a good township of land of six miles square, within sd purchase, invested with the same right of sd Township as the said Company now have, and shall further promise to be laid out when it shall be convenient, for the purposes aforesaid and not so as to prejudice but in aid of our settlers, that have already been on. And it is to be understood that the said Montgomery, Young, &c. are to become parcel of our said settlers, and under the same regulations, with our settlers as such. And we have sent herewith two of our proprietors as a Comtee to treat with you on the affair and go with you to Wyoming, to wit, Capt. Zebulon Butler, and Mr. Ebenezer Backus, and to lay out said Township as they and you shall agree, if you think best. Capt. Butler to remain at Wyoming with you, Mr. Backus to return and bring us advice as soon as the circumstances of the case will permit. You may Expect Maj. Durkee to join you as soon as his affairs will permit, And whereas many of the Settlers that will join you soon, we have a good deal of reason to Expect success with our assembly in May.

"Now as there are sundry things in favor of the Colony title that we have discovered lately, we wish you good success in this and every lawful enterprise and are your sincere friends and

"Very Humble Servants,

"ELIPHALET DYER,

"SAML. GRAY,

"NATHL. WALKER, JUN.,

"Comtee for sd Company.

"JOHN MONTGOMERY & LAZARUS YOUNG, ESQRS."

No sooner had the mass of the settlers left the valley than the forces of Ogden and Jennings commenced the plunder of all the property left

Of the subsequent events in the history of that brave partisan leader we shall not here refer.

Col. Elder, writing to Col. Burd about this period, says, "Lazarus Stewart is still threatened by the Philadelphia party; he and his friends talk of leaving. If they do, the Province will lose some of its best friends, and that by the faults of others, not their own, for if any cruelty was practiced on the Indians at Conestoga or at Lancaster, it was not by his or their hands. There is great reason to believe that much injustice has been done to all concerned. In the contrariness of accounts we must infer that much rests for support on the imagination or interest of the witnesses. The characters of Stewart and his friends were well established. Ruffians nor brutal they were not, but humane, liberal, and moral, nay, religious. It is evidently not the wish of the party to give Stewart a fair hearing. All he desires is to be put on trial at Lancaster, near the scenes of the horrible butcheries committed by the Indians at Tulpehocken, etc., where he can have the testimony of the scouts and rangers, men whose services can never be sufficiently rewarded. The pamphlet has been sent by my friends and enemies; it failed to inflict a wound; it is at least but a garbled statement; it carries with it the seeds of its own dissolution. That the hatchet was used is denied and is it not reasonable to suppose that men accustomed to the use of guns would make use of their favorite weapons? . . . The inference is plain

The list of Paxtang men at Wyoming in 1770 are given herewith. Those italicized were members of the Paxtang rangers:

James Ehea was said to have come to Wyoming as one of them, and Abel Yarrington was said by his grandson to have been one of the later arrivals.

Deed of John McDonner to Zebulon Butler, 22d of February, 1770, Westmoreland Records, vol. 1, p. 153 (consideration 45), for ye whole of my settling right of lands at Wyoming that I have or may have or be entitled to by my coming on and Taking possession with Capt. Butler, in February, 1770.

S. Parsons, of Connecticut, under date of March 12, 1770, writes to Capt. Zeb^l Butler, at Wyoming, on Susquehanna, congratulating him on his successful Expedition to Wyoming with 200 settlers. He also sends his compliments to the Paxtang boys, stating that he is under obligations to them for saving the settlers from the rapacious mouths of the grasping Pennsylvania proprietors.

that the bodies of the Indians were thus mangled after death by certain persons to excite a feeling against the Paxtang boys. This fact Stewart says he can and will establish in a fair trial at Lancaster, York, or Carlisle. At any rate, we are all suffering at present by the secret influence of a faction,—a faction who has shown their love to the Indians by not exposing themselves to its influence in the frontier settlements."

After this hurried glance at the history of this transaction, we believe we have made good the following:

1st. The notoriously bad character of the Indians at Conestoga. Apart from the various affidavits taken before Edward Shippen, of Lancaster, and Thomas Forster, of Paxtang, we have the opinion of Gen. Amherst, commander-in-chief of the British forces in America, of Lord Halifax, and of Governor Colden, of New York.

2d. The reiterated demands for their removal, and that if this was done peace to the frontiers was guaranteed.

3d. The so-called insurrection or riot, as stigmatized by historians and by the Assembly of the Province, was nothing of the kind. It was a right guaranteed by the charter for the people to meet in assembly and demand or petition for redress of grievances.

4th. The oft-repeated slander that the men who composed the Paxtang volunteers came to untimely ends is only in keeping with the marked untruths used by Quaker historians and Quaker pamphleteers. It is greatly to be lamented that all the names of those brave Paxtang boys have not been preserved to us, but those we have are sufficient to enable us to hurl back the imputation cast upon their memory. With the exception of lion-hearted Lazarus Stewart, who fell in that terrible Indian, Tory, and British massacre which devastated the valley of Wyoming on the 3d of July, 1778, the heroes of Conestoga lived long, valuable, and respected lives. Two of them were subsequently elders in Old Hanover Presbyterian Church. Those who followed Rev. Sankey into the Valley of Virginia became some of the most influential citizens of the Old Dominion. Two at least of the signers of the Mecklenburg Declaration were Paxtang men, and one of the descendants of another became President of the United States. Several became honored ministers, and one the president of a college.

5th. Peace from Indian incursions was forever secured to the settlers of Paxtang.

Three important questions now agitated and inflamed the public mind:

1. Whether a Proprietary government or one with kingly powers was the government best adapted for this Province?

2. Was the destruction of the Indians in Lancaster County justifiable on the plea of necessity?

3. Was the policy adopted by Proprietary government and the Assembly in treating with the Indians judicious?

THE CHARACTER OF THE INDIANS.

[Governor Calden, of New York, to Governor John Penn.]

The Indians on the east side of the Susquehanna are the most obnoxious to the people of this Province of any, having done the most mischief. They consist of a number of rogues and thieves, runaways from the other nations, and for that reason not to be trusted.

[The Council of New York.]

This government is rather disposed to attack and punish than to support and protect them, whom they still consider their enemy.

CONDUCT OF THE PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES—COTEMPORARY OPINIONS.

[Letter of Gen. Amherst to Governor Hamilton, Oct. 26, 1763.]

I cannot help repeating my surprise at the infatuation of the people in your Province, who tamely look on while their brethren are butchered by the savages, when without doubt it is in their power by exerting a proper spirit not only to protect the settlements, but to punish any Indians that are hardly enough to disturb them.

[See reply of Assembly to the Governor in answer to Governor Amherst's letter, October 22d.]

[Earl of Halifax to Governor Hamilton, Oct. 19, 1763.]

His Majesty has commanded me to express to you his surprise and displeasure at a conduct so inconsistent with the security of the lives and properties of his subjects in Penn's in particular, as well as to the duty they owe to the public safety in general.

[Lieutenant-Governor John Penn to his uncle, Thomas Penn.]

The five frontier counties are now preparing petitions to the House for an increase of Representatives, which I am of opinion they (the Assembly) will never come into, as it will be the means of lessening the power of the governing few in this Province. . . .

"THE PAXTANG BOYS."

Among the number of those heroic men of 1763-64, writes Hon. John Blair Lind, author of "Buffalo Valley," was Capt. John Reed, who removed to the Buffalo Valley prior to the Revolution. He married, in September, 1772, Margaret, daughter of William Blythe, but died in 1778, leaving three children, William, James, and a daughter, who subsequently married John Armstrong. The family left the valley with the "great runaway," and resided for several years in the Cumberland Valley. The widow subsequently married Capt. Charles Gillespie, of the army of the Revolution, and raised a second family. When a second time a widow she took refuge with her son, William Reed, where she died, and is buried in the old Kiester graveyard on Penn's Creek. William Reed, the eldest, had a son James, whose children are Robert Reed, formerly county commissioner of Union County, and subsequently a merchant at Clearfield; Dr. Uriah Reed, of Jersey Shore; and a daughter, who is the wife of ex-Governor William Bigler. Capt. Reed's second son removed to the West in early life, but was never heard from.

REMINISCENCES OF THE OLD HOME.

Those who were on terms of intimacy with the late Robert Gilmor, Esq., will remember with what pleasure he related incidents connected with the Grahams and Fergusons, especially after his return from one of his visits to some of the descendants of those families resident in Kentucky. These are forcibly brought to our mind as we peruse a letter written by the late John Graham, of Hardie County, Ky., under date of Sept. 28, 1867. He was then upwards of eighty-five years of age, and the letter, written in lead pencil, betokens neither age or tremulousness. He thus alludes to events of the by-gone, being a native of Hanover:

" . . . You allude to the massacre of the Conestoga Indians near Lancaster. I have often heard my grandmother speak of that affair, and of the Paxtang boys or rangers. It was something like the tea-party at Boston. The men who done it were not known. Old Parson Elder was the colonel of the regiment; the rank and file who were engaged in the affair were the most respectable of men. I had an old uncle, Thomas Bell (he was married to my grandfather's sister); he was an elder in Hanover Church when I can recollect him first, and died an elder in 1815. My grandmother always said that Uncle Bell was one of the squad who were at Conestoga, but was not an elder in the church at the time. The reason for killing those Indians was that then and long before there were a great many murders committed, and the friendly Indians harbored the strange Indians, who were the guilty parties. It was the only thing to do, and every person on the frontiers approved of the act."

THE PAXTANG BOYS.

Charles Miner, the impartial historian of Wyoming, during the preparation of his valuable work, opened up a correspondence with most of the historic students of his day. From one of his letters, written to a gentleman of this locality, whose information concerning the Paxtang boys was superior to that of any one then living, we take the following extracts:

"The history in which my pen is engaged is confined to Wyoming. But a portion of the Paxtang boys settled here and took a conspicuous part. I had read in early life, with unmitigated horror, the publications of the day reciting that crimson tragedy and not an alleviating circumstance mentioned. Whether to note their being here, their agency, etc., or to pass it over in silence as one of those dark occurrences of which the least said the better, was matter of doubt. But I resolved to investigate, and finally wrote a paper to be inserted or not, as should, on reflection and consultation, be thought best. That paper is, I believe, in the hands of one who married a daughter of Stewart. I therefore, from memory, give the heads of my argument.

"On settling in Luzerne, I found Hanover, a valuable township, full of most worthy and respectable inhabitants, which had been specially allotted to and settled by the Paxtang boys.

"1. Not only were they esteemed for humanity, integrity, and virtue, but so also had those been who were gone to the grave, for Col. Demou, our most staid, sober-minded, religious man had named his oldest son for Lazarus Stewart. He could not have been ignorant of his true character. If he was the bloody-minded demon who, without provocation, had murdered women and children, he would not, he could not, have done it.

"2. Connecticut—religious, moral, politic, or cunning—in establishing a settlement at Wyoming would have gone counter to principles, policy, and common sense by engaging in their cause a set of men whom the moral sense of mankind had excommunicated from society for crimes involving cowardice and wanton cruelty. It could not be so. There must be some other version of the affair. So I looked as far as my vision could extend into the times when, and immediately preceding the event, and found—

"3. That the preceding summer the Indians had murdered the Wyoming settlers. Massacre, conflagration, and ruin were driven like a whirlwind on all the white settlements from thirty to forty miles west of the Susquehanna to the mountains. So audacious had the Indians become that they descended below the Blue Mountains, and committed murders in the neighborhood of Bethlehem. The whole frontiers were aroused to despair and madness. Under these general provocations and that frenzy of excitement the deed seems to have been done, deeply to be deplored and the victims to be pitied.

"4. Fifty Paxtang boys entered Lancaster in open day. It was known they were coming. If not welcome, why did not the people rise five hundred strong, as they might easily have done, and effectually expelled the assailants?"

"5. But there was also a Highland company of regulars stationed at Lancaster. They neither pulled a trigger or presented a bayonet. Is it not evident that authorities and people did not look upon the deed as a cruel, unprovoked murder? but that they connived at it, if they did not participate, believing that the cruelties of the Indians justified their cutting off. Without such influence the conduct of the troops and the people of Lancaster would be unaccountable."

The foregoing are the opinions of one whose research, intelligence, and impartial judgment "puts," as he himself expresses it, "a very very different face upon it (the transactions at Conestoga and Lancaster) than has been given heretofore," and to those who have imbibed their ideas from historians warped in their judgment by partisan rancor and puritanical zeal, we commend Mr. Miner's conclusions. Our opinions we have from time to time given, not unsubstantiated, nor with the view of detracting from the fair fame of any class of people, but for the purpose of throwing aside the veil of obloquy which fanatical fury for over a century has covered the gallant frontiersmen of Paxtang, who loved their homes and their darling ones too well to tolerate a nest of copper-colored vipers in their midst.

THE APOLOGY OF THE PAXTANG VOLUNTEERS.

Addressed to the candid & impartial World.

As our Late Conduct at the Conestoga manner & Lancaster has occasioned much Speculation, & a great Diversity of Sentiment in this & ye neighbouring Governments; some vindicating & others condemning it; some charitably alleviating the Crime, & others maliciously painting it, in ye most odious and detestable Colours, we think it our Duty to lay before the Public, ye whole matter as it appeared and still appears to us.

But in order to have a just Idea of our Conduct, it is necessary to recollect a few things which are recent in the memories of thousands in this Province, & which they will ever have Reason to remember. When ye Province of Pennsylvania was flourishing in Prosperity & Plenty, & ye peaceful Inhabitants suspected no Danger from the Incursions of their savage Neighbors; but all their fair prospects were suddenly exchanged for scenes of ye most melancholly Distress and Horror. By the breaking out of an Indian war, ye State of four Frontier Counties in this Province became wretched and deplorable beyond Description. The Indians set Fire to Houses, Barns, Corn, Hay, in short to everything that was combustible; so that ye whole Country seemed to be in one general Blaze & involved in one common Ruin. Great Numbers of ye Back Settlers were murdered, scalped and butchered in the most shocking manner, and their dead Bodies inhumanly mangled; some having their Ribs divided from ye chine with the Tomahawk, others left expiring in ye most exquisite Tortures, with their legs and arms broken, their skulls fractured, & ye Brains scattered on the ground. Many children were either spitted alive and roasted or covered under the ashes of a large Fire before their helpless Parents eyes. Ye Hearts of some taken out and eaten reeking hot, while they were yet beating between their Teeth and others, where Time and opportunity would admit of it were skinned, boiled and eaten. Hundreds were carried into ye most miserable Captivity, separated from all the Endearments of their Friends & ye Privileges of ye Christian Church and are daily tortured to Death in every method of Cruelty which Indian Barbarity can suggest. Let any man, that has any Sentiments of humanity or any Bowels of Compassion for the miserable imagine himself in the midst of those scenes that were exhibited on every attack that is made on our Frontiers: there to see the Husband butchered in the Presence of his helpless wife, while ye Children are clinging round his Knees; or in another Place ye widowed mother reserved to be a Spectator of ye inhuman massacre of her tender Family, before she receives ye friendly hatchet that closes her Eyes on ye shocking Scene. Look round & behold, and those that are with Child ripped open & mangled in ye most indecent manner. On the other hand ye see hundreds of miserable Refugees flying to ye nearest Frontier Town, with a Part of their Families leaving ye remainder of them in the Hands of ye Enemy, or wandering till they perish in ye Woods. On this Side ye see hundreds reduced from plentiful and independent Circumstances, to a State of Beggary and Despair; taking Shelter in the Hovels and Stables to secure their helpless Families, from ye Inclemency of ye Night or ye Season; while others cannot even obtain this, but are obliged to make Fires in ye woods and live even worse than the Savages themselves. And on that Side Ye hear ye Screams of Children deprived of their nearest Relatives, that know not perhaps what is become of them, the fruitless Sighs of the disconsolate Widow, or ye Groans of a broken hearted Father mourning for a darling Son or Daughter, whom he had dedicated to God, but who is now abandoned to the Service of the Devil, and who perhaps on a future Day may help to make a Party to murder and Scalp some of his nearest Relatives. There ye see whole Families butchered while they are asleep, or whole Garrisons put to Death by ye Savages. None but those who have been spectators or Eye witnesses of these shocking Scenes can possibly have any adequate Ideas of our Sufferings. Nay even those very Persons, who are so hardened and destitute of the common Feelings of Humanity, as to be able to extenuate these horrid Barbarities, under the charitable Plea of its being their Custom of making war, would we doubt not be softened, had they but shared with us in the lightest Parts of our sufferings.

But let us next enquire into the causes of these Calamities, under which we have laboured these seven or eight years, during the last and ye present War. Different Persons ascribe them to different causes, either from their ignorance of some Facts, which are necessary to be considered; or from some sinister Views or bad Designs. All seem to be agreed that the French instigated ye Indians, first to strike us, & used every method to retain them in their Interest, until their own Power was broken and destroyed in America. But ye weak, defenceless state of our long extended Frontier, was another Cause of ye War, or at least of our feeling ye Calamities of it as severely as we did. We had no Militia in the Province to come to our assistance, no stockades or Forts to repair to for Safety; the Inhabitants living formerly in Peace were unaccustomed to the use of arms, & unacquainted with ye Indian method of making war; so that we were unable to defend ourselves against ye first Incursions of our Savage Enemies, & knew not where to look for Help. In this miserable Situation we continued for more than a year, while our Distresses were Daily increasing, many were murdered, many captivated, & more than 200 miles of a Frontier Country was laid waste & deserted. But ye defenceless state of our Frontiers is not sufficient to account for our Distresses. For one would think that a Government might do something to help a bleeding Frontier in less than a year; & who could suspect that ye men in Power refused to relieve ye Sufferings of their fellow Subjects. Unnatural as this appears, yet many of us were but too well convinced of it & constrained to mourn in Silence over our hard Fate. When we applied to the Government for Relief, the far greater Part of our Assembly were Quakers, some of whom made light of our sufferings & plead Conscience, so that they could neither take arms in Defence of themselves or their Country, nor form a Militia Law to oblige the Inhabitants to arm, nor grant ye King any money to enable his loyal Subjects in ye Province to reduce the common Enemy. If they were conscientious in this matter, & found that it was inconsistent with their Principles to govern in a Time of War, why did they not resign their Seats to those who had no Scruples of this kind. One would think, that if they really sympathized with us in our Sufferings, this is ye least they could have done. But this they did not do, until they were forced to it, till their Friends in England interposed, & insisted upon it; lest a Bill should pass in Parliament to Disqualify such Persons having any Share in Government in time of war. But this is not all; altho' our Charter secures to each County an equal Number of Representatives, four at least, and more if the Governor & Assembly at any Time think proper, yet they allowed our five Frontier Counties but ten Representatives in Assembly, while ye three interior Counties have twenty-four. Is not this a flagrant Instance of Injustice and what can we think of a Sect, that could do such an act, and yet would have ye world believe that they were inspired & led by the Holy Spirit, & that they were ye true Disciples of the holy Jesus. Can they who had it in their power to remove this complaint be Friends to Liberty, which they can deliberately & persevere in such a notorious Violation of our Charter, and such a scandalous Encroachment on so important a Privilege as being equally represented in Legislation? Can there be any Reason for this Inequality, if it be not, that ye Quakers being ye majority in ye three interior Counties, they are resolved at any Rate to fill ye House of Assembly & rule ye Province? However others may think of this, we are certain, that if we had had a proper Number of Representatives in Assembly agreeable to ye stipulations of ye Charter so many of our Brethren had not been murdered & captivated. Something would have been done sooner for our Relief & Assistance. We can ascribe this to no other cause, than to their insatiable Thirst of Domination, which may be gratified tho' at ye Expense of the Lives of thousands of their fellow Subjects. Let this unjust Infringement of our Rights be removed before they ever pretend to be influenced by the Principles of Common Justice, ye Dictates of Conscience or ye miseries of their fellow Subjects? 'Tis true they gave up some of their Seats in ye Assembly in the last War, when they could no longer hold them & when we were obliged to deny some of our murdered Brethren ye Privilege of a Grave until we had brought them to Philada. & exposed them with all their wounds to open view; if peradventure we might thereby excite their Compassion for our distresses. But still they left ye Root of ye Evil, & retained ye Power of filling the House when they pleased; which Power they have again exercised; & had not Providence favoured us ye last summer in preserving Coll. Boquet with his little army they had again involved our Frontier in one general Devastation. Notwithstanding previous & warm Remonstrances against their Resolutions of affording him no assistance, they persevered in their Determinations, & absolutely put it out of ye Power of ye Governour & Provincial Commissioners to send any Escort with him to Fort Pitt; when every Person in ye Government saw that if he was defeated or cut off on his march that important Fortress must have shared ye same Fate with ye unhappy Presque Isle, Sandusky, Mehillenackeac, Miamms, St. Mary's, & St. Joseph's which must have fallen a Sacrifice to Indian Cruelty; & four whole Counties must have inevitably deserted their Habitations, & left ye means of their Subsistence in ye Hands of ye Savages. Quakers may talk what they will of ye Happiness & Justice of their Administration, but these are such glaring Evidences of their unjustifiable Usurpation, their thirst of Power, their want of ye Principles of Justice & ye common Feelings of human Nature for the Distressed; that we cannot but blame them as ye cause of many of our Sufferings.

Does this Conclusion seem too severe to any or not sufficiently supported? Let us attend a little to some other Facts, which appear to us to confirm ye same Judgment of them. 'Tis true that the Assembly last year voted 800 men to guard the Frontiers. But had the Design been to have sent so many men to have only looked on the Ravages that were committed amongst ye back settlers without giving them ye least assistance, it could not have been more effectually executed. They were prohibited by Law from going over ye Boundaries of the purchased Lands after the enemy altho' this Power was granted to ye Gov by ye Royal Charter. Every Person in the Province saw that this was only to insult their Distresses. For 100,000 Men could not have guarded 200 miles of a Frontier against ye Incursions of ye Savages in this manner, whereas 800 men might have done great service, had they been allowed or authorized to follow them into their own Country. There were a thousand Chances to one that men stationed on the Frontiers in the manner appointed by ye Assembly would not see a single Enemy during ye whole season, even tho' ye Inhabitants should be murdered every day. The Assembly well knew that their Conduct would be severely animadverted on, if they would make no Provision for assisting a bleeding Frontier; yet they found a Way to save the Lives of ye Enemy & to suffer ye Inhabitants to be murdered, while they had the Shelter of a Vote of the House. What was this but to load us with unnecessary Taxes, when we were already reduced to the most abject Poverty? Was this like sympathizing with us or assisting us in our Distresses? Had they been in the Interest of the Enemies of his Majesty, what could they have done more for them? Pardon the Expression, they have found means to do much more for them in the last War. When the Quakers could no longer keep their Seats in the Assembly, & thereby prevent any assistance being given to us, a Number of their leading men immediately erected an Association, & collected 5000 Pounds, which they have by their own Confession mostly distributed in Presents to the Indians; under the Pretence indeed of buying Peace with them. Under this Pretext they encouraged them to go to Philadelphia, where we are credibly informed, they treated them as Friends, entertained them at their Houses & loaded them with Presents, while they were boasting thro' the Town to ye Inhabitants, how many white People they had killed or led into Captivity, in which such of them as have not made their Escape with ye utmost Danger or were tortured to Death for attempting it, continue till this Day. Nay under a Pretence of holding Treaties with them they constantly kept Intelligence with them, sent Messages to them, & rec'd a string of wampum from them as if they had ye Power of making and of all Treaties had Commissioners to make them Peace & War Presents, to furnish them with Arguments, to violate their making War with us & to condemn the Proprietaries as the Occasion of the War. And after these Treaties, when the Indians were returning with Presents, they seldom ever failed to murder some of us. Now would any Person believe, that the Quakers would be so liberal to Savages, and at ye same Time not contribute a single Farthing as a Society to help our Distresses ye last Summer altho' applied to for this Purpose, when near a thousand Families of our Frontier Inhabitants were obliged to abandon our Habitations, when every other religion Society in ye City of Philadelphia did? They did Nothing for us. And can any Man believe after all this, that we judge wrong when we ascribe a great Share of our Sufferings to the Quakers. If these things are not sufficient to prove an unjustifiable Attachment in ye Quakers to Indian Savages, a fixed Resolution to befriended them & an utter Insensibility to human Distresses, let us consider a few more recent Facts. When we found the last Summer that we were likely to get no assistance from the Gov some Volunteers went out at our own Expence determined to drive our Enemies from our Borders; & when we came near to the great Island, we understood that a Number of their warriors had gone out against our Frontiers. Upon this we returned & came up with them & fought with them at ye Munsey Hill, where we lost some of our men and killed some of their warriors and thereby saved our Frontiers from this stroke. But no sooner had we in another Expedition destroyed their Provisions on the great Island, & ruined their Trade with ye good People at Bethlehem, but these very Indians who were justly suspected of having murdered our Friends in Northampton County, were by ye Influence of some Quakers taken under ye Protection of the Gov to screen them from the resentments of ye Friends & Relations of the murdered, & to support them thro' the Winter. Many hundred Pounds were readily granted for ye support of about one hundred & twenty of these Enemies; when but three hundred Pounds were charitably voted for the Relief of more than four thousand Persons, that were driven from their Habitations & destitute of the necessaries of Life. Is not this glaring Partiality in Favour of Indian Enemies? When were any Sufferings sent by the Quakers to cure our wounded on the Frontiers? And did not some of them send a Doctor even to Fort Augusta to cure a wounded Indian? Nay when we came down to Germantown to remonstrate against ye Governour's supporting our Enemies at ye public Expence; did not ye Quakers openly pull off the mask & take up Arms to defend them against us, when they suspected that we designed to kill them. These Persons must love the Indians much, when they would even sacrifice their Religion & Consciences for them, which they would not do for their King & Country. But this is not all: did they not apply to the Governour to send an Express to ye Enemy Indians to let them know, that altho' we came to Philadelphia to destroy their Friends in the Baracks, ye Citizens had arrived in their Defence, so that they were still alive & safe? 'Tis true that ye Pretence was, lest ye Enemy Indians hearing Nothing from their Friends at Philadelphia, would upon a supposition that they were killed by ye white People, take a severe Revenge upon ye Frontiers. But the Governour declared in ye most peremptory Terms, that he would do no such thing; judging ye suppose, & on very good Grounds, that ye most natural Consequence of such an Intelligence would be, to influence ye Enemy Indians with the greater Revenge against ye Frontier Inhabitants, & occasion their falling upon us with redoubled Fury. But notwithstanding this, did not the Quakers send such an Express lately to ye Indians at War with us. Could any person believe that ye Quakers are so little acquainted with human Nature or so bad Politicians, as not to foresee these fatal consequences to our back settlers? To what cause then can we ascribe this Action of theirs, but to what we have long suspected, a disloyal attachment to Indian Enemies.

But how comes it to pass, that ye Indians, who are confessedly at war with us, should expect any Intelligence from ye Indians at Philadelphia? It is said, that before they went to Philada ye Enemy Indians told them that ye white People would kill them upon which they promised to send them an account before an appointed Day if they were still alive, but if they rec'd no Express they might conclude that they were cut off. But why this agreement between enemy Indians, & those that are said to be in ye Interest of the White People, if they really were in our interests? Are they to be accounted our Friends, who can hold Correspondence with our Enemies? Are they not of ye same Tribe? And is it our hard Fate to be at War with a Tribe, while a part of it is supported at ye public Expence & furnishing their Brethren with constant Intelligence about ye State of affairs among us? Have not we given, in our Remonstrance laid before the Governour, as full Proof, as the Nature of the Affair can admit of, that ye Indians won at Philada carried on a secret Correspondence & Trade with our Enemies on the great Island, & therefore should also be treated as Enemies? Has any Quaker even attempted amongst all ye bitter scurrilous things that are published against us to shew that we concluded against these poor Innocents as they affect to call them from false or weak Premises we have not better Evidence that any particular Tribe or Nation of Indians have been at War with us, than that all ye Indians that lived amongst us were also our Enemies. We have long been convinced from sufficient Evidence that ye Indians that lived as independent Commonwealths among us or near our Borders were our most dangerous Enemies, both in the last & present War, altho' they still pretended to be our Friends, The Wyatusing Indians, who lived on the Senescaunah are confessedly at War with us; & we are certain that that part of them who lived at Bethlehem carried on a Correspondence with our Enemies, & furnished them with Implements of war & are justly suspected of committing murders in Northampton County; as one of them is proved upon Oath to be ye Person that murdered Stintow with his family. The Rum-debauched & Trader-corrupted Thieves & Vagabonds that lived on Susquehanna & Ohio are indisputably unfaithful & perfidious. Scarcely were ye most public Treaties concluded with them, when they murdered the Inhabitants; nay in ye very Time of them, they were forming Schemes how they might destroy us, after they had received Blankets, Ammunition, & other Presents from ye white People. The five Nations, that have ever retained some Reputation for Honour & Fidelity have told us, that they have reproved the Delawares &c. & shook them by the Hair of the Head, as they express it; & have lately gone to war against them & have taken 40 of their Warriors prisoners. The Commonwealths of Indians permitted contrary to ye maxims of good Policy to live in a time of War in our Bounds have been our most dangerous Enemies; as they murdered our Inhabitants, lead them into Captivity, were Guides to other Indians reported our weak & defenceless state to ye French together with all our motions & Dispositions against them; & at ye same Time wearing the Cloak of Friendship, they could readily obtain Provisions, Ammunition, & Warlike Implements to convey to our Enemies. Their well known claim to Freedom & Independency put it in their Power to harbour Spies & give Intelligence. They have ever asserted & exercised the Right of making War & Peace as independent Nations, never came under our Laws, nor acknowledged Subjection to our King & Government; but they always governed themselves by their own Customs, & exercised ye Power of Life & Death over their own People. 'Tis true that ye little Commonwealth at Conestogoe have in one Point Stipulated with us that if an Indian killed a white man, ye Indian should be tried by our Laws; which is still consistent with their being a free & independent State. Mournful Experience has convinced us that no Nation could be safe especially in a Time of War, if another State or Part of a State be allowed to live among the free & independent, claiming & exercising within themselves all ye Power of Government, ye Powers of making War & Peace, harbouring & corresponding with ye Enemies of ye state wherein they live, receiving their spies, giving them Intelligence, & furnishing them with ye means of support & Implements of War. No such Privilege has been granted to any Commonwealth in any civilized Nation in the World. But this has been allowed to Indians amongst us, we justly complain of it as ye Source of many of our Calamities, as they have all proved perfidious.

Knowing that the little Commonwealth of Indians at Conestogoe that pretended to be our Friends, had done us much mischief, & were in Reality our most dangerous Enemies in Number of Persons living amongst us, who had taken their Houses in Flames, their Parents and Relatives butchered in ye most inhuman manner, determined to root out this Nest of perfidious Enemies; accordingly cut them off. This action has occasioned much warm Debate; & some have maliciously represented it as an unparalleled inhuman Massacre of an Innocent and harmless People. But let us consider ye matter impartially, & we hope to give such Evidence, as we think, will make it appear unreasonable, to conclude so severely against us.

We hope that it will not be disputed but that if the Conestogoe Indians were in Confederacy with our open Enemies, gave them constant intelligence of what we were doing, were frequently amongst our Enemies, were trusted and depended upon by the French as their Friends, had gone to War against us & had actually murdered some of us, they were as much our Enemies as any other Tribe of Indians on the Continent. We trust that it will also be readily granted, that their living amongst us put it in their Power to be a more dreadful Enemy than any other Tribe that consisted of no more Persons & that their aggravated Perfidy justly exposed them to an aggravated Destruction. And we hope that if we are able to bring as good Evidence of their being Enemies as ye Nature of ye Thing cau aduit, our adversaries will be satisfied with it. We have been long fully convinced & upon ye plainest Evidence that they were Enemies; but for ye satisfaction of others we have since collected many Oaths sworn at different Times, before different Magistrates & by Persons of undoubted Probity and Veracity, to prove this Point; which we shall lay before ye impartial World. And any Person that will take the Trouble may collect as many more of the same kind as he pleases.—

Before me the Subscriber chief Burgess of the Borough aforesaid personally appeared Anne Mary La Roy of the Borough aforesaid, & made Oath on the holy Evangelist, that in the year 1755, when her Father John Jacob Laroy & divers others were murdered by the Indians at ye great Makkana, She this Deponent & her Brother with others were made Prisoners, and taken to ye Kittittaman an Indian Settlement, and that she remained a Prisoner with the Indians until ye year 1759, in which year she with three other Prisoners made their Escape.

That during her Captivity with the Indians; the French officers were furnished with the Pennsylvania Gazette weekly, or once in two weeks; so that a frequent Correspondence was carried on; That she saw strange Indian messengers come with Intelligence; and that ye French officers and Interpreters, with whom she was employed, told her this Deponent, that these Messengers were ye Conestogoe Indians, and that the English had not one Indian in their Interest but one, and that was Isaac, and farther added that all the Conestogoe Indians were willing to take up the Hatchet against the English when the French requested them. And this Deponent farther deposed & saith, that since ye Time of her Escape from the Indians, Bill Sock's reputed Mother came to her at Lancaster, & after some Enquiry about ye Indian Family she was Prisoner with, she this Deponent enquired, whether she ye ^{sd} Bill Sock's Mother had been out in any of ye back Parts, who replied that she never had, but that her son Bill had been out often & would go out again, & that he was good for Nothing, or words to that Purpose.

That some Time during this Deponents Captivity aforesaid an Indian named Jo Compass appeared at ye Kittittaman aforesaid having two children of one Peter Leek's Prisoners, & told her that he had killed both their Father & Mother; & this Deponent farther deposed, that she knew ye ^{sd} Peter Leek's & his wife before they were killed, & knew their children aforesaid before they were made Prisoners; and that ye ^{sd} Jo. Compass frequently went out to war from ye same Kittittaman whilst she was Prisoner there, & was said to be sent out against Swatnar, Taul-pabakin, Canegogis, & the South Branch; & that she saw ye same Indian Jo. Compass at ye last Indian Treaty held at Lancaster.

In the year 1762 as ye Indians were coming down to the Treaty, they happened to stay at my House in Halifax; a Man whose Name as near as I can remember was William Phillips & his wife, being both prisoners, told me they would be qualified, that ye Indians held two Councils, & agreed that they would go to Philadelphia & get what they could, & so return & cut off the back settlements. On their Return ye Indians stayed four Days about my Place & proved very insolent, took about six acres of corn, killed several Hogs, & took ye Fruit of about 150 bearing Trees, and farther saith not.

That he this Deponent before this Time had frequently seen Bill Sock with his Brother and others of Conestogoe Indians at Fort Augusta & often met them on ye Communication carrying up Keggs of Whiskey & other things to trade with ye other Indians there, but that after this murder ye s^d Bill Sock did not appear at that Garrison for near four months, and then came there with a Number of other Indians from up the River above the Fort, at which Time he behaved in a different manner than usual, not coming into the Fort nor being so familiar as formerly. It would be endless, & we apprehend unnecessary, to transcribe Oaths upon this Head. We have it in our Power to prove upon the Oath of a Person of unquestionable veracity who was present at & heard a Conversation between George Sock a Conestogoe Indian & another strange Indian who came down to ye Treaty at Lancaster; that when ye s^d Indian reproached s^d Sock that he was no man & had no Business at ye Treaty, said Sock replied, that altho' he had taken no Prisoners, yet he had during ye course of war killed six white men; upon which ye other Indian rose up, took him by the Hand & drank to him as a Brother. It can also be proved that Cannay Sam called the s^d Sock a Thief, for that he living among ye white People has stolen six Scaps, & had brought them to ye Indian Town where s^d Sam was at ye Time and it is a thing notorious that strange Indians were frequently seen among ye Conestogoe Indians at their manor, would carry some Time, have a War Dance, & then depart. From the evidence that we have laid before the World, it appears that not only the Conestogoe Indians, but also those that lived at Bethlehem, & in other Parts of the Province were all perfidious,—were in the French Interest & in Combination with our open enemies,—furnished them with our public Papers every week or fortnight,—gave them Intelligence of all the motions & Dispositions of ye Province Army against them—were frequently with the French and Indians at their Forts & towns,—supplied them with Provisions & warlike stores,—entertained strange Indian spies,—joined with them in their War Dances, and in their Parties that made Incursions on Frontiers,—were ready to take up the Hatchet against the English, when the French requested it,—murdered and scalped our Brethren,—insolently boasted of the horrid murders they had committed, when they saw that our Blood was tamely covered at ye last Treaty, & themselves loaded with Presents,—Confessed they had been at War with us again,—and even went so far as to put one of their Old Warriors to Death when he refused to go to War against us. This is but a small Part of the Evidence upon which we proceeded, when our Neighbors cut off that perfidious Remnant of a Tribe at Laacaster & Conestogoe manor, & when we came to Germantown to petition the Governour for ye Removal of ye Bethlehem Indians now in Philadelphia out of the Province. And what Evidence can we expect to be sufficient, to prove any Indian Commonwealth our Enemies, if this is not? What then means all ye malicious Clamour against us, as if we had murdered our innocent Friends? Are not we as justifiable in getting off this Tribe of Enemies as any other? Can their living amongst us justify their Perfidy, or entitle them to commit Ravages upon his Majesty's loyal Subjects with Impunity?

We know it has been said by their Friends; if there was sufficient Evidence to convict any of the Conestogoe or Bethlehem Indians of being Enemies; why were not ye particular Persons named & actions brought against them, so that they might have the Benefit of a fair Trial; especially as they have publicly stipulated to be tried in our Courts of Justice, if any of them should be accused of killing any of his Majesty's Subjects?

This could never be understood as a Stipulation to take Place when ye Tribe become Enemies to his Majesty, but only to provide for the Trial of murderers in a Time of Peace. In this Respect it was absolutely necessary, as they were an independent Commonwealth in ye Heart of the Province, but it would be absurd when they were at war with us. When they gave up this Power to us, they notwithstanding retained their claim to Freedom & Independence, & exercised all ye Power of a free state, the Power of making War & Peace, of exercising criminal Jurisdiction &c. And can any Person be so little acquainted with the Law of Nature, as to suppose that their giving up this single article to us, would secure to every Individual of them the Benefit of a Trial by our Laws, when they were Enemies or tie up our Hands so that we could not chastize them, when they broke their Treaties with us, in ye same manner that we chastize our other Enemies. With as much Reason might it be demanded of us, not to move beyond our own Borders after our Enemies, but patiently suffer ourselves to be murdered & scalped until we could take some of our Murderers alive & bring them to Trial in our Courts of Justice. For most of ye Ravages on our Frontiers have been committed by Tribes of Indians, that have made ye same agreement with us in a Time of Peace. But who does not see the Absurdity of such a Demand in Favour of a Tribe either openly or secretly at War with us? And lastly what Nation under ye Sun ever dealt with Individuals of another Nation at War with them, & not with ye whole Body or Nation?—And here we cannot but observe to aggravate ye matter, & to involve us in the unjust charge of Disloyalty to our gracious King, whom we have faithfully served with success through ye late & present Indian wars; we understand that it is said, that the Conestogoe Indians were under the Protection of the Government; and therefore it was flying in the Face of lawful authority to kill these Indians, especially such of them as were in the Work-House in Lancaster. We are of a very different Opinion in this Particular, & believe that altho' ye Indians were by the Consent of the Magistrates of Lancaster in the Work House there. For there is Power in any Government to protect its Enemies, that is, to ruin itself. 'Tis true that ye Governour for the Time being is vested in the 16th Article of ye Royal Charter, with ye Power & Office of a Captain General, to levy muster & train all sort of men, of what Condition soever, whosever born, in the Province, to make War, & pursue all Enemies, Robbers, &c, as well by Sea as by Land even without ye Limits of the Province, & by God's Assistance to vanquish & take them, & when taken to put to Death by the Law of War, or to save them at Pleasure. But no Justices of ye Peace have nor can have this Power. The Legislature, Executive & Federal Powers of Government are distinct in themselves & belong to different Officers; & a Commission to exercise one of these Branches of Power can never authorize any Person to exercise another. The Legislative & Executive Powers of making & executing Laws respect only the Subjects of ye Government; & ye Business of those, that are vested with them by proper Commissioners is only to determine matters that concern the members of the Community. But the Federative Powers of Government, which respect foreign independent States, and which include the Power of sending Embassadors, making War & Peace, treating with or punishing Enemies, giving military Commissions, constituting Courts martial &c belong only to the Governour as Captain General. Every other Inhabitant of ye Province is prohibited in ye 15 Sect: of ye aforesd Charter from maintaining any Correspondence with any other King, Prince or State or with any of their subjects that shall be at War with his Majesty. From whence we conclude that it is absolutely repugnant to the Law of Nations, to ye British Constitution & to the Royal Charter granted to our Proprietors, for any Person, however vested with ye legislative or Executive Powers of Government, to interfere at Treaties with foreign independent States or Commonwealths of Enemies, or carry on a correspondence with them in Time of War: nor have they any thing to do with them, but as private Persons in Time of Peace. Therefore whether ye civil Magistrates at Lancaster, looked upon that free State of Indians that lived in their Neighborhood, as Friends or Enemies, they neither had nor could have a Power by Virtue of their Commissions, to protect these Enemies of his Majesty against the Resentments of his injured Subjects. And it appears to us that they were sensible that their Commissions did not authorize them to protect these Indians for they never attempted to defend them. Indeed the very attempt would argue either Ignorance of their Office or Rebellion against his Majesty, neither of which can be justly laid to their charge. So that we conclude that we insulted no lawful authority, nor flew in ye Face of Government, but acted as loyal Subjects of his Majesty when we cut off these his enemies.

But let us even suppose that the Magistrates were mistaken about ye extent of their Power (for all Men are fallible), and that they thought they had Power & it was their Duty to protect these Indians. Would it therefore be right to defend his Magesties Enemies, merely because they thought they should do it, or did not know that they were Enemies. "By no means," you will say; "but 'tis wrong to resist ye civil Magistrate when he happens to be mistaken." 'Tis readily granted that we should not resist him when he happens to mistake in the Execution of his Office, or in determining any matter that lies within his proper sphere: but his Commission as a civil officer cannot warrant him to do anything that lies out of his Province, or entitle him to a tame Submission to ye Persons, that might suffer from such an usurpation. Would it not be right to resist a Constable that would plead his commission as giving him a Right to sit on the Bench with the Magistrates? Would it not be right to respect a Member of Assembly who would plead that his being a Representative of the free Men of the Province entitled and authorized him to usurp ye federative Powers of Government, & interfere at public Treaties with Enemies? And would it not be right to resist a Justice of the Peace if he would plead his commission as giving him a Power of making Laws, striking money, proclaiming War, making Peace, trying Criminals & hanging Malefactors? And can it be wrong to resist a civil Magistrate, if he should presume upon his Commission to protect his Majesty's most dangerous Enemies? Would not ye attempt argue Disloyalty to his Majesty & Disaffection to his Government? And can it be wrong to oppose what arises from so dangerous a Principle? Can it be wrong to suppose what must necessarily terminate in ye Subversion of all Order & government?

But we understand that ye manner of our coming down to Germantown has been severely condemned as illegal & subversive of government. We need not say much upon this Head. We injured no man on the Road, used no Violence to any; payed for everything that we had, and were guilty of no Irregularities. We came down to remonstrate and petition his honour the Governour and ye honourable Assembly of the Province for a Redress of the many Grievances under which we groan. We had the Satisfaction to find that ye Attorney-General of ye Province, the Mayor of the City, with some Members of the Assembly & other Gentlemen whom the Governour condescended to send out to converse with us at Germantown declared in the plainest Manner that we had hitherto done Nothing inconsistent with our Duty to ye best of Kings, with our Privileges as British Subjects, ye Duty of Government, or ye Character of good Subjects. And we can assure ye Publick that ye same was proclaimed in ye most public Manner by Appointment ye next Day in the City of Philadelphia. And when ye Gentlemen whom we had the Honour to converse with in Germantown promised us a Redress of our Grievances we immediately dispersed and returned in Quietness to our Respective Places of Abode.

CHAPTER XIII.

The War for Independence—Resolves of Hanover—Resolves of Middletown—The Liberty Association of Londonderry—The Pennsylvania Articles of Association—Capt. Matthew Smith's Company of Paxtang.

THE discussions which ensued upon the Paxtang boys' affair may truly be said to have sown the seeds of the Revolution; and in a letter of Governor John Penn to his brother in England, written at this time, he thus alludes to the inhabitants of Paxtang: "Their next move will be to subvert the government and establish one of their own."

No wonder, then, when the first mutterings of the storm was heard, that the people of this entire section were ripe for revolution. The love of liberty was a leading trait of the people who settled this delightful valley. The tyranny and oppression of Europe drove them to seek an asylum among the primeval forests of America. Persecution for conscience's sake compelled alike the Scotch-Irish and the German of the Palatinate to come hither and rear their altars dedicated to God and freedom to man. With them independence was as much their dream as the realization. Their isolated position—placed on the frontiers, unprotected by the Provincial authorities—early instilled into their minds those incentives to action, that when the opportune moment arrived they were in the van. Two years before the declaration by Congress the people had assembled at their respective places of rendezvous, and heralded forth their opinions in plain and unmistakable language, while the citizens of the large towns were fearful and hesitating.

As early as the spring of 1774 meetings were held in the different townships, the resolves of only two of which are preserved to us. The earliest was that of an assembly of the inhabitants of Hanover, Lancaster Co., held on Saturday, June 4, 1774, Col. Timothy

Green, chairman, to express their sentiments on the present critical state of affairs, and it was unanimously resolved,— “1st. That the recent action of the Parliament of Great Britain is iniquitous and oppressive.

“2d. That it is the bounden duty of the people to oppose every measure which tends to deprive them of their just prerogatives.

“3d. That in a closer union of the colonies lies the safeguard of the liberties of the people.

“4th. That in the event of Great Britain attempting to force unjust laws upon us by the strength of arms, our cause we leave to heaven and our rifles.

“5th. That a committee of nine be appointed, who shall act for us and in our behalf as emergencies may require.”

The committee consisted of Col. Timothy Green, James Carnthers, Josiah Espy, Robert Dixon, Thomas Koppenheffer, William Clark, James Stewart, Joseph Barnett, and John Rogers.

The foregoing declarations are worthy of perpetual record. They struck the key-note of the proceedings which eventuated in the separation of the colonies from England. It is worthy of remark in this connection that, while Philadelphia and the lower counties were hesitating and doubting, the Scotch-Irish districts were firm yet dignified in their demands for justice and in the denunciation of British tyranny and wrong. These Hanover resolves preceded those of the Mecklenburg Convention, showing that the liberty-loving Scotch-Irish of Pennsylvania were the head and front of the American rebellion of 1776.

So much for patriotic Hanover. Following in the footsteps of these brave men, on Friday following, June 10, 1774, a similar meeting was held at Middletown, Col. James Burd, chairman, at which these stirring resolves were concurred in, and which served as the text of those passed at the meeting at Lancaster subsequently:

“1st. That the acts of the Parliament of Great Britain in divesting us of the right to give and grant our money, and assuming such power to themselves, are unconstitutional, unjust, and oppressive.

“2d. That it is an indispensable duty we owe to ourselves and posterity to oppose with decency and firmness every measure tending to deprive us of our just rights and privileges.

“3d. That a close union of the Colonies and their faithful adhering to such measures as a general Congress shall judge proper, are the most likely means to procure redress of American grievances, and settle the rights of the Colonies on a permanent basis.

“4th. That we will sincerely and heartily agree to and abide by the measures which shall be adopted by the members of the general Congress of the Colonies.

“5th. That a committee be appointed to confer with similar committees relative to the present exigency of affairs.”

Not to be behind their Scotch-Irish neighbors, the German inhabitants, located in the east of the county, met at Frederickstown (now Hummelstown) on Saturday, the 11th of June, at which Capt. Frederick Hummel was chairman, resolving to stand by the other townships in all their action.

Oppression, taxation without representation, and a host of other political evils, kindled a feeling of animosity to the mother-country in the breasts of the people of America.

In December, 1774, the general committee of Lancaster County was formed, consisting of delegates from all the townships. At the first meeting the present Dauphin County was represented by the following gentlemen:

Paxtang.—James Burd, Joseph Sherer, John Backenstose.

Hanover.—Timothy Green, William Brown, James Cooper.

Derry.—Castle Byers, William Laird, Robert McKee.

Upper Paxtang (above Kittochtinny Mountain).—William Patton.

Londonderry.—John Campbell.

Paxtang.—Joseph Sherer, William Brown, John Harris.

Hanover.—John McCune, John Rodgers, William Cathcart.

Londonderry.—William Hayes, Robert Clark, Jacob Cook.

Upper Paxtang.—Adam Werts, James Murray, Samuel Taylor.

This locality was ripe for revolution, and when the stirring battle-drum aroused the new-born nation, the inhabitants of Dauphin valiantly armed for the strife.

Within forty-eight hours of the receipt of the news of the battle of Lexington the able-bodied men of this entire region were organized for the defense of their liberties. The performance of military duty was no new thing to men who had been cradled amidst the clash of arms in the protection of the frontiers made desolate so many years by the ruthless savages,—the merciless Delawares and the perfidious Shawanese. The document we publish herewith gives the names of the first company of the associators we have yet seen. Almost the entire company were residents of Londonderry township. Its commanding officer, Capt. Jacob Cook, was prominent in organizing the troops throughout the war, at the same time being one of the Provincial magistrates, and as such continued by the convention of July 15, 1776. First Lieut. William Hayes rose to be a lieutenant-colonel in the Flying Camp in 1776-77, doing gallant service in the Jerseys and at Brandywine and Germantown. The McQueens, Robert and David, were subsequently connected with the Flying Camp, and, if we mistake not, were at Fort Washington at its capture. Of the men who composed this first Londonderry company, several served through the war from Quebec to Yorktown, while others fell martyrs to the cause of independence. The articles of association to which the men all subscribed are worthy of preservation:

"The Association of the Liberty Company in Lancaster County.

"In order to make ourselves perfect in the art of Military, &c., We, the subscribers, have associated, and severally Agree, Prouise, and Resolve as follows, viz.:

The foregoing articles of association preceded any other adopted in the colonies, and formed the basis of the Articles of Association of Pennsylvania, read and approved by the Council of Safety on the 12th of August, 1775. They read as follows:

"We, the officers and soldiers, engaged in the present association for the defence of American Liberty, being fully sensible that the Strength and Security of any Body of Men, acting together, consists in just regularity, due subordination, and exact obedience to command, without which no individual can have that confidence in the support of those about him, that is so necessary to give firmness and resolution to the whole, Do Voluntarily and Freely, after consideration of the following articles, adopt the same as the Rules by which we agree and resolve to be Governed in all our Military concerns and operations until the same, or any of them, shall be changed or dissolved by the Assembly, or Provincial Convention, or in their recess by the Committee of Safety, or a happy reconciliation shall take place between Great Britain and the Colonies:

1st. "If any Officer make use of any profane Oath or execration, when on duty, he shall forfeit and pay for each and every such offence, the sum of Five Shillings. And if a Non-Commission'd Officer or Soldier be thus guilty of Cursing or Swearing, he shall forfeit and pay, for each and every such offence, the Sum of One Shilling.

2d. "Any Officer or Soldier who shall refuse to obey the Lawful orders of his Superior Officer, may be suspended from doing duty on that day, and shall, upon being convicted thereof before a Regimental Court Martial, make such concessions as said Court Martial shall direct.

3d. "Any Officer or Soldier who shall begin, excite, cause, join in, or promote any disturbance in the Battalion, Troop or Company, to which he belongs, or in any other Battalion, Troop or Company, shall be censured according to the nature of the offence, by the judgment of a Regimental Court Martial.

4th. "Any Officer or Soldier who shall strike his Superior Officer, or draw or offer to draw, or shall lift up any Weapon, or offer any Violence against him, being in the execution of his office, shall, upon conviction before a Regimental Court Martial, be dismissed, and shall be deemed to be thereby disgraced as unworthy the Company of Freemen.

5th. "Any Commanding or other Officer who shall strike any person when on duty, shall, upon conviction before a General Court Martial, be in like manner dismissed and disgraced.

6th. "Any Officer, non-Commissioned Officer or Soldier, who shall make use of insolent, provoking or indecent language while on duty, shall suffer censure or fine as shall be inflicted by a Regimental Court Martial, according to the nature of the offence.

7th. "If any Officer or Soldier should think himself injured by his Colonel, or the Commanding Officer of the Battalion, and shall upon due application made to him, be refused redress, he may complain to the General of the Pennsylvania Associates, or to the Colonel of any other Battalion, who is to summon a General Court Martial, and see that Justice be done.

8th. "If any inferior Officer or Soldier shall think himself injured by his Captain, or other Superior Officer in the Battalion, Troop or Company to which he belongs, he may complain to the Commanding Officer of the Regiment, who is to summon a Regimental Court Martial, for the doing Justice according to the Nature of the case.

9th. "No Officer, Non-Commissioned Officer or Soldier shall fail of repairing with their arms, ammunition and accoutrements upon any regular alarm, or at the time fixed, to the place of parade or other rendezvous appointed by the Commanding Officer, if not prevented by Sickness or some other evident necessity, or shall go from the place of parade without leave from the Commanding Officer before he shall be regularly dismissed, on penalty of being fined or censured according to the nature of the offence, by the sentence of a Regimental Court Martial. But no Officer or Soldier shall be obliged to attend to learn the Military Exercise more than once in a week.

10th. "Any Officer or Soldier found Drunk when under Arms, shall be suspended from doing duty in the Battalion, Company or Troop on that day, and be fined or censured, at the discretion of a Regimental Court Martial.

11th. "Whatever Sentinel shall be found sleeping upon his post, or shall leave it before he is regularly relieved, shall suffer such penalty or disgrace as shall be ordered by a Regimental Court Martial.

12th. "Whatever Commissioned Officer shall be convicted before a General Court Martial, of behaving in a scandalous or infamous manner unbecoming the Character of an Officer and a Gentleman, shall be dismissed from the association with disgrace.

13th. "Every non-Commissioned Officer or Soldier who shall be convicted at a Regimental Court Martial of having sold, carelessly lost, wilfully spoiled or wasted, or having offered for sale any ammunition, arms or accoutrements belonging to this Province, shall be dismissed such Battalion, Troop or Company, as an unworthy member and be prosecuted as the law directs.

14th. 28th. "Upon the determination of any point by a Regimental Court Martial, if the Officer or Soldier concerned on either side, thinks himself still aggrieved, he may appeal to a General Court Martial; but, if upon second hearing, the appeal appears groundless and vexatious, the person so appealing shall be censured, at the discretion of the General Court Martial.

32d. "No Commissioned, non-commissioned Officer or private, shall withdraw himself from the company to which he belongs, without a discharge from the Commanding Officer of the Battalion, nor shall such person be received into any other company without such discharge.

"In Testimony of our approbation and consent to be governed by the above regulations, which have been deliberately read to, or carefully perused by us, we have hereunto set our hands."

Congress, by a resolution of 14th June, 1775, provided for raising six companies of expert riflemen in Pennsylvania, two in Maryland, and two in Virginia, which, as soon as completed, were to join the army near Boston. By a resolution dated June 22d, the "Colony of Pennsylvania" was directed to raise two more companies, which, with the six, were to be formed into a battalion, and be commanded by such officers as the Assembly or convention should recommend. This resolution having been communicated to the Assembly, it resolved, June 24th, "that the members of Congress deputed by this Assembly be a committee to consider of and recommend proper officers of the said battalion."

The form of enlistment was: "I have this day voluntarily enlisted myself as a soldier in the American Continental Army for one year, unless sooner discharged, and do bind myself to conform in all instances to such rules and regulations as are or shall be established for the government of the said army." Each company was to consist of one captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, a drummer or trumpeter, and sixty-eight privates. The pay of the officers and privates was as follows: Captain, twenty dollars per month; a lieutenant, thirteen and one-third dollars; sergeant, eight dollars; a corporal, seven and one-third; a drummer or trumpeter, the same; privates, six and two-thirds, to find their own arms and clothes.

One of the first companies raised in the colonies was that of Capt. Matthew Smith, of Paxtang. Within ten days after the receipt of the news of the battle of Lexington this company was armed and equipped for service, and when the orders of Congress came it was ready. At the same time a company had been raised in and around the town of Lancaster, which information reaching the Congress, both were accepted into the Continental service. The patriotism of Pennsylvania was evinced in the haste with which the companies of the First Pennsylvania (Thompson's) Battalion were filled to overflowing, and the promptitude with which they took up their march for Boston. The Philadelphia Evening Post of Aug. 17, 1775, publishes a New York item: "That between the 28th of July and 2d instant the riflemen under the command of Cpts. Smith, Lowden, Doudel, Chambers, Nagel, Miller, and Hendricks passed through New Windsor (a few miles north of West Point), in the New York government, on the way to Boston." From a letter dated at Hartford the latter part of July it is stated: "Yesterday came to town a number of Paxtang boys, dressed and painted in the Indian fashion, being part of a body of two hundred volunteers who are on their way to Gen. Washington's army at Cambridge. Several of them we hear are young gentlemen of fortune." Capt. Smith's company was the first to arrive at Boston, coming south of the Hudson River. It was subsequently ordered to join Gen. Arnold in his unfortunate campaign against Quebec, and the most reliable account of that expedition was written by a member of this very Paxtang company, John Joseph Henry, afterwards president judge of Lancaster and Dauphin Counties. They were enlisted for one year. The following facts are chiefly from contemporary records. Capt. Chambers, who commanded a Cumberland Valley company in Col. Thompson's battalion, writes under date of 13th of August:

"We arrived in camp on the 7th ultimo, about twelve o'clock. We were not here above an hour until we went to view the lines where the English camp is all in plain sight. We crossed the lines, and went beyond the outposts to a small hill, within musket-shot of a man-of-war and a floating battery, and not farther from the works at the foot of Bunker Hill, where we could see them very plainly. While I was standing there some of our riflemen slipped down the hill about a gun-shot to the left of us and began firing. The regulars returned it without hurting our men. We thought we saw one of the red-coats fall. Since the riflemen came here, by the latest accounts from Boston, there have been forty-two killed and thirty-eight prisoners taken at the light-house, twelve of the latter Tories. Amongst the killed are four captains, one of them a son of a lord, and worth forty thousand pounds a year, whose name I cannot recollect. The riflemen go where they please, and keep the regulars in continual hot war.

"They are every day firing cannon at our people, but have not yet killed a man. We expect six wagons loaded with powder here in two or three days, and when they arrive our twenty-four pounders will begin to play on their ships and the lines on Bunker Hill. It is difficult for our men to get within shot of them, as they have floating batteries that flank the end of Winter Hill and men-of-war on the other side, though our boys think they killed several of them. About an hour ago I saw a small cannonading between two of the enemy's boats and one of our batteries to the north of Boston. We can see all the town distinctly from our fort on Prospect Hill, and it is a very pretty place. Two deserters came to us last night."

Thacher, in his military journal of the Revolution, under date of August, 1775, describes this battalion:

"They are remarkably stout and hardy men; many of them exceeding six feet in height. They are dressed in white frocks or rifle shirts and round hats. These men are remarkable for the accuracy of their aim, striking a mark with great certainty at two hundred yards distance. At a review a company of them while on a quick advance, fired their balls into objects of seven inches diameter, at the distance of two hundred and fifty yards. They are now stationed in our lines, and their shot have frequently proved fatal to British officers and soldiers who expose themselves to view, even at more than double the distance of common musket shot."

This battalion formed the picket guard of the two thousand Provincials who, on the evening of the 26th of August, took possession of and threw up intrenchments on "Ploughed Hill," and on the morning of the 27th met with its first loss,—private Simpson, of Capt. Smith's company, who was wounded in the leg and died therefrom. "Poor Simpson," wrote Lieut.-Col. Hand, "had one of his legs shattered by a cannon ball. The director-general took it off, but the poor lad was buried this evening."

On the 5th of September, Capt. Matthew Smith's and Capt. William Hendricks' companies were ordered to parade upon the common in Cambridge, and join the detachment "to go upon command with Col. Arnold." For a full and interesting account of the hardships and sufferings of these two companies, see Judge John Joseph Henry's narrative (Lancaster, 1812). These companies led the advance under Captain (afterward Col.) Daniel Morgan, through the wilderness of Maine. At Fort Western, on the Kennebec, says Henry, it was decided to dispatch an officer and seven men in advance, for the purpose of ascertaining and marking the paths which were used by the Indians towards the heads of the river, and ascertain the course of the river Chaudiere. Arnold found it necessary to select an officer of activity and courage. The choice fell upon Lieut. Archibald Steele, of Smith's company, who selected as his companions Jesse Wheeler, George Merchant, and James Clifton, of Morgan's company; and Robert Cunningham, Thomas Boyd, John Tidd, John McKonkey, and John Joseph Henry, of Smith's company.

These companies participated in the attack on Quebec, on the morning of the 31st of December at Palace Gate, where, as the dispatch of the day reads, "that excellent young officer, Capt. William Hendricks, of Pennsylvania, fell, and the rest of the command, after desperate fighting, were forced to surrender. The survivors were paroled on the 7th of August, 1776, and after being exchanged for the most part, re-entered the service, following the fortunes of the Pennsylvania Line with Gen. Wayne, down into Georgia, resisting the fearful night attack made upon Wayne's camp, near Sharon, Ga., on the 24th of May, 1782; entering Savannah in triumph with him on the 11th of July; Charleston on the 14th of December, 1782, and only returning in the month of July, 1783, when the last of the Pennsylvania troops embarked at James Island, S. C., on board of transports for Philadelphia.

Roll of Capt. Matthew Smith's Company.

[Capt. Smith was allowed a bounty of one dollar each for eighty men enlisted. Henry states that sixty-five of their number reached the Plains of Abraham in November. Of the whole company, nearly captured on the 1st of January, scarcely thirty, he states, remained in prison. They arrived at New York, Sept. 11, 1776, and were exchanged, in 1778, for the St. John's prisoners, captured by Gen. Montgomery.]

At the battle of Long Island, Aug. 27, 1776, the company, like the battalions, was badly broken up. Owing to injuries received in that conflict, Capt. Marshall resigned in February following. COL. JAMES BURD'S BATTALION.

In addition to the soldiers in the Pennsylvania battalions raised in Dauphin County, the following associated battalions were formed. In March, 1776, the Fourth Battalion of Lancaster County Associators, Col. James Burd commanding, were in the field, and from that period until after the battles in and around Philadelphia they were almost constantly in service.
 These rolls form the most complete battalion of minute-men of the Revolution we have yet seen.

Capt. James Cowden's Company.

[The following roll contains one hundred and fourteen names, officers and privates. During the campaign of the year 1776 they were in active service;
 quite a number were captured at Fort Washington, and several lost their lives. Many of the younger portion subsequently enlisted in the Pennsylvania Line, remaining in the patriot army until its close. By reference to the names of these departed heroes of a century ago, it will be seen how many of their descendants remain in our midst.]

Capt. James Murray's Company.

[This company, with others, first went into service in November or December, 1775, and were present at the battles of Trenton and Princeton. We give the roll as we find it, although a number of the names are evidently misspelled. The members of the company nearly all resided in what was then Upper Paxtang township, or in the section of country from the present town of Dauphin extending to Halifax. Beyond and around the latter locality was Capt. Reed's company, the roll of which is given subsequently. There is one name on the list, that of John Ayres, who was a member of Capt. Matthew Smith's company of Paxtang, and was left with several others sick at Boston when that brave body of men marched to Quebec. The probabilities are that as they were returning home, about the time of the arrival from Philadelphia, he at least joined his friends and neighbors and shared with them the hardships and endurance of that brief winter campaign on the Delaware.]

Capt. John Reed's Company.

[Capt. John Reed, the commander of the following company during the Jersey campaign of 1776-77, was the son of James Reed, who located near the mouth of Powell's Creek probably as early as 1728. On maps prior to 1800 the location is marked "Reed's." John Reed had been a ranger on the frontiers during the French and Indian wars, and when the war of the Revolution came he was ready for the conflict. He organized the company of associators which is herewith given, and was in service until after the battles in and around Philadelphia. Capt. Reed died in 1789. His son William was quite prominent in the Upper End, and it was for him that Reed township was named. On the roll are the names of many whose descendants remain in this locality.]

[The company of Capt. Deibler was in active service for nearly a year, returning home in January, 1777. A portion of the command was captured at the battle of Long Island, and were not released from captivity until the year 1778. During that and the following year the company was commanded by Capt. John Hoffman, and under him they were on the frontiers, protecting the defenseless inhabitants from the encroachments of the Indians and Tories who had their headquarters in Southern New York, and against whom Gen. Sullivan's army was successfully sent in 1779. The little company from Upper Paxtang did valiant service, and all through the Revolution were a well-disciplined body of men.]

CHAPTER XV.

The War for Independence (continued)—Col. Timothy Green's Battalion—Rolls of Captains Koppenheffer's, McQuown's, Brown's, Rogers', McCallen's, and Rutherford's Companies.

COL. TIMOTHY GREEN'S BATTALION.

WITHIN the limits of the present county of Dauphin it has been stated that at least two thousand patriots were mustered for the army of the Revolution, serving their God and country faithfully, and shedding the best blood of the country at all the sanguinary conflicts from Quebec to Yorktown. Authorities have been questioned, but it will be found that the documents which we furnish will greatly augment the number given of actual participants in the struggle for independence. Among the first of the associators to enroll themselves was the Hanover Rifle Battalion of militia of Lancaster County associators, Col. Timothy Green commanding. The battalion was formed in the fall of 1775, and a portion of the companies went into active service during the ensuing spring, while the balance followed in August, 1776. Some never returned, having fallen in one of the numerous skirmishes during the Jersey campaign, while others, wounded in their country's cause, dragged their maimed limbs down to the close of their brave lives, deriving a pension-pittance from the government they had established, yet sustained by the reverence and respect of their fellow-citizens, with the satisfaction of having done their duty faithfully.

Capt. Richard McQuown's Company.

[Capt. Richard McQuown, or McEwen, as the name is at present spelled, who commanded the following company, was a native of Hanover, the son of John McQuown, who located in that township as early as 1735. Of Capt. McQuown's subsequent history to the campaign in the Jerseys, where he seems to have borne a distinguished part, we know but little. In 1777 the company was under the command of Capt. Ambrose Crain, whose services during that year at Brandywine and Germantown are certainly deserving of proper recognition at our hands. He was a member of Old Hanover Church during the first years of the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Snodgrass. He went to the Valley of Virginia and died there. James McCreight, who was second lieutenant, was prominent in Hanover, and a magistrate for many years. He died the 25th of August, 1807, aged sixty-six years. David Ramsey, the next in rank, died on the 18th of September, 1787, aged forty-two years, and with his fellow-officers in the Revolution lies interred in the old church graveyard in Hanover. Although the descendants of many of the members of this band of patriots have passed out from the homes of their ancestors, a few, as will be noticed by reference to the names, are properly represented in the county, and, it is to be hoped, all worthy children of honored sires.]

Capt. James Rogers' Company.

[Capt. James Rogers, whose company follows, was a native of Hanover township, born in 1735. His father located on the Manada prior to 1730, and left a large family of children. James seems to have been quite prominent on the frontiers, was a member of the Hanover congregation, a non-commissioned officer during the French and Indian wars, and at the outset of the Revolution became an ardent patriot. He raised a company of associators, and during the struggle for independence was quite active. He died on the 18th of April, 1790, and is buried in Hanover Church graveyard.]

James Wilson, first lieutenant, is to be distinguished from the other James Wilsons as Capt. James Wilson. He died in October, 1806, well advanced in years. He is buried in Hanover.

Henry McCormick, second lieutenant, was born in Hanover. He evidently died about the close of the Revolution, leaving sons, William, Henry, David, and daughters, Isabella and Mary.

Andrew Rogers, third lieutenant, was a brother of Capt. James Rogers. He was born in Hanover in 1745, and died on the 19th of September, 1782.

The fourth lieutenant, Robert Martain, or Martin, was the son of John Martin, one of the earliest settlers on the Manada. He died about 1805.

The descendants of the foregoing officers, as also of the majority of the privates, are scattered over the various States of the Union.]

Capt. Robert McCallen's Company.

[The McCallens were early settlers in Derry and Londonderry. Out in old Derry Church burial-ground lie the remains of Capt. Robert McCallen, the officer who commanded the band of associators which follow. Little else is known about the brave captain, save that he was in active service during the years 1776 and 1777. He was a member of Derry congregation, and his name is in the lead among the subscribers to the graveyard wall.]

Concerning Lieuts. Matthew Hays and David McQueen we have but little information. They both took the oath of allegiance as required by the State of Pennsylvania in August, 1778, before Jacob Cook, justice for Londonderry.

Ensign Thomas McCallen, a brother of the captain, was also a native of Derry, and lies interred in the old graveyard. He married, Feb. 4, 1768, Mary Boyle, of Derry. He died Oct. 12, 1806, aged seventy-one years; his wife Oct. 16, 1812, aged seventy-one years. On their tombstone is this significant sentence,—

"Respected by their friends,
But without a child to mourn their loss."

This family name has probably died out in this locality, the last of whom we had any knowledge dying a few years ago.]

A military convention representing the fifty-three battalions of the associators of Pennsylvania met at Lancaster on the 4th of July, 1776, to choose two brigadier-generals to command the battalions and forces of Pennsylvania. A complete report of this meeting is given with the Revolutionary history of Lebanon County, to which we refer our readers.

The Declaration of Independence was passed by the Continental Congress at Philadelphia on the same day when the military convention met at Lancaster, to wit, on July 4, 1776. On that day the thirteen Confederate Colonies dissolved their allegiance to the British crown and declared themselves free and inde- pendent, under the name of the Thirteen United States of America. From the Philadelphia Packet we find that the Declaration was received in Paxtang on the 8th of July, and on the day following was proclaimed in the following order: "Col. Burd and the other field-officers of his battalion repaired to John Harris', the light infantry companies marching there with their drums beating, pipes playing, and the standard (the device for which is the Thirteen United Colonies) which was ordered to be displayed. After that the Declaration was read by Maj. Cornelius Cox aloud to all who were assembled, who gave their hearty assent with three loud huzzas, discharged their field-pieces, and fired in platoons."

The advice of Congress in May, 1776, that governments sufficient to the exigencies of affairs should be established in such colonies as they did not already exist was seized upon by the zealous Whigs of Pennsylvania as the excuse for the abrogation of the old government. A convention to form a new Constitution was called the 15th of July. That the necessity for some change in the government was thought indispensable is obvious from the faint resistance that was made to the choosing of delegates.

When the work of the convention was made public it called forth the opposition of a number of Whigs in and around Philadelphia who had not lost faith in the old government. While giving a hearty support to the cause of the Revolution, they thought the true interests of Pennsylvania could be best served by the election of men of undoubted patriotism to office under its original charter. The motives of the men who formed that convention have remained unquestioned. Unlearned in state-craft, they framed what they thought the best form of government for the people they represented. The members of that body, which closed its labors on the 28th of September, included two from this section,—Capt. Joseph Sherer, of Paxtang, and Maj. Philip Marsteller, of Lebanon.

On the 31st of July, 1776, the commissary-general of Pennsylvania made a contract with "John Bennett, of Harris' Island, opposite the town of Harrisburg," to transport provisions, stores, and munitions of war from the town of Marietta, on the bank of said river, to Wyoming fort, near the town of Wilkes-Barré. "Said Bennett to convey the goods safely by water, in keel-boats or in flat-boats, from Marietta to the fort within fourteen days, whenever notified of their arrival by wagon from Philadelphia. A guard of three soldiers will be detailed to accompany and protect each boat or fleet of boats when ready to start." This protection was from vicious Tories and from Indians.

The boats used by Bennett were flat-boats of a suitable size, such as we have seen in use to ferry across rivers, and, in fact, were owned by him to carry his produce, his horses and cattle to and from the main land to the village of Harrisburg, and he then farmed and lived upon the large island in the middle of the Susquehanna on which the two sections of the great bridge rest which was built many years afterwards. We may well suppose the volume of water in the river was greater in those days of almost uncut forest throughout the river water-shed, as a great freshet which occurred that very spring rose so high as to submerge the island, and Bennett only saved his family and all the farm cattle he had by placing them in his three flat-boats and securing them to the largest trees, fifteen feet from the ground. Such a freshet since the bridge was built would sweep itself and the abutments from the island.

He also provided keel or Durham boats, so called from Durham Creek, up the Delaware, near Easton. These kinds of boats continued to be the means of transporting iron, flour, grain, etc., from the upper portions of the Delaware, Schuylkill, and Susquehanna to the cities below, and of taking back again the groceries and other goods needed up the country. They will be remembered by the older inhabitants as being used upon the Schuylkill until the building of Fairmount dam in 1819, and on the Delaware until the completion of the Lehigh and the Delaware Division Canals, about 1825, rendered them obsolete.

The channel—so called by the boatmen—of the Susquehanna is peculiar, with a very rocky bed, and almost a mile wide. A boat drawing one or two feet of water, in low or moderate stages of water, would soon strike upon the rocks and be wrecked unless kept to the channel. This, even in low water, is usually about five feet deep, and runs swifter than the shallower portion checked by the scattered rocks, and it shifts and crosses the river from side to side as the largest portion of water is curved and thrown over by the foot of projecting mountains.

To force the loaded boats up against the swift current at about ten miles a day, Bennett and his men would have to walk twenty miles, and perform work harder than Napoleon's soldiers when they dragged cannon up the Alps some thirty years later. The boatmen, generally three to each side, used setting-poles about ten feet long. Standing near the bow, they thrust the larger end against the ground or the stones at an inclination, and placing the upper end against their shoulder, pushed the boat forward, in fact, walked the boat from the bow to the stern, making it move forward just her own length. The impetus kept the boat from falling back until, having drawn their poles up, they walked forward again to the bow and repeated the operation, and so on to the end of the day. The supplies were thus transported from Philadelphia across to the Susquehanna, via Lancaster, in Conestoga wagons, occupying about four days, thence pushed by toilsome steps against the descending current of the Susquehanna for ten or fourteen days; then requiring two weeks of time and toil, now six and a half hours, with one man to feed an iron horse with fuel and another to control his speed and stop him.

Capt. John Rutherford's Company, 1776-77.

[This company was in active service throughout the campaign in the Jerseys during 1776, and the roll as here given was as the company stood when they assembled at Middletown on the 12th of August, 1777, preparatory to their participation in the campaign around Philadelphia. The four additional names are on the roll for September of that year, probably joining the company prior to the battle of Brandywine. We have no note as to what battalion they were connected with.]

CHAPTER XVI.

The War for Independence (continued)—Names of Persons who took the Oath of Allegiance, in Paxtang, Londonderry, and Hanover Townships—Assessments of Non-Associators, 1777.

A HISTORY of the Test Oath in Pennsylvania is an interesting subject, but we can only refer our readers to vol. iii., second series "Pennsylvania Archives," for a summary thereof. Suffice it to say that owing to the large number of Tories in and around Philadelphia during the Revolution, it was decided necessary by the Convention of July 15, 1776, which adopted the first Constitution of the State, and by the first Assembly acting under it, to adopt an oath of allegiance, a measure which was absolutely necessary to restrain the insolence of the Tories.

To this measure of self-protection the Quakers of Chester, Bucks, and Philadelphia made stern resistance, and a number of the more prominent of them were exiled to Virginia, as an example to others of the fate which awaited those persisting in a refusal to take the oath. In the interior counties there was little or no objection. The people were patriotic from the first, and had an inborn hatred to British oppression and British tyranny.

CHAPTER XVII.

The War for Independence (continued)—Roll of Capt. John Marshall's Company—Indian Incursions—Abolition of Slavery—Register of Slaves—Rolls of Captains McAllister's, Walker's, and Weaver's Companies—The Close of the War—Continental.

In the State regiment of foot, commanded by Col. John Bull, subsequently by Col. Walter Stewart, 1777-78, was a Dauphin County company,—that of Capt. John Marshall. It suffered severely at Brandywine and Germantown. Towards the close of the year 1777, by a resolution of Congress, the State regiment was annexed to the Pennsylvania Line and formed the Thirteenth Regiment.

John Harris, in writing to President Wharton on the situation of public affairs, under date of Paxtang, 29th January, 1778, gives an opinion which is just as worthy consideration to-day as it was over a century ago,—that in dealing with the Indian question should never act upon the defensive, but attack the savages in their own country at all hazards. His letter runs thus:

"SIR: The bearer, Col. William McAloskey, is an honest man, and a true friend to the glorious cause of liberty, going down for aid to defend our frontiers against the encroachments of the savages. I am of opinion that the Indians will take an active part next spring (for or against us), as their young men don't understand acting as neutrals in time of war; and unless they, the Western Indians, deliver up hostages to the United States immediately, or send a number of their warriors to our camp to join us, we may depend upon an Indian war taking place against us, and ought to prepare for it as well as our present circumstances will admit. A defensive war against savages will never do the needful.

"However prudent and necessary it may be to grant assistance to several parts of the frontiers, etc., at particular times, and when we are assured that a general Indian war will take place, we must attack them in their own country at all hazards. If a French war takes place, I hope we may be eased of an Indian war, which will be a great mercy. I make free to give your honor my sentiments of the times, and conclude."

As Harris supposed, in the early part of spring the situation of the people of Northumberland County and the West Branch was imminently critical. A large party of Indians, Tories, and English deserters entered the county and commenced a war of extermination upon the settlers, who were without the means of defense, the greater portion of the able-bodied men, with their trusty rifles, being in the service. On the 3d of June, John Harris writes to Vice-President Bryan,—

"SIR: I have received several letters from Col. Hunter lately, mentioning the distressed situation of Northumberland County, etc. It appears absolutely necessary that some person should receive, store, provide, and forward any stores the public may order up the Susquehanna, Juniata, etc., during the present Indian war. A quantity of flour is wanted; not a cask or bag to put it in. The inhabitants are leaving said county in great numbers. I pity my bleeding country, and am willing to assist the supplying the county of Northumberland by any means in my power, or forward any article up the different branches of this river from time to time. I am as good a judge of the navigation, in either boat or canoe, on our river as can be found. I expect to send up a quantity of stores to the lead mines, up Juniata, at Water Street as soon as I receive a letter from Mr. Roberdeau, which I hourly expect. The present flood to convey by water should not be lost, as perhaps no other may happen till next fall. The quartermaster can furnish provisions for boatmen or any necessary escorts, etc. If the inhabitants in their fright are suffered to move off as they are doing, and assistance not soon sent up, the crops will be lost in many frontier places, that may be saved by their getting timely aid from the public. A quantity of arms, some powder and lead, is here for Northumberland County, which I expect will be forwarded to-morrow. There's two good store-houses at my dwelling plantation, exclusive of a cellar fifty feet by forty, under my dwelling-house so that there's plenty of store-room for the public use if wanted. There's a great concourse of public wagons, etc., with stores, on the Reading road, too few flats at the ferry here, and what there is will not be properly attended, that the public may suffer for want of a few men employed by the public (to assist in my opinion). I have rented my tavern, ferry, etc., and am at leisure to assist the transporting stores, etc., up the Susquehanna as offered, if proper instructions are sent me. You'll please write to me by bearer, Mr. Whithill, if you judge necessary."

In July, 1778, a large number of the survivors of the Wyoming massacre arrived at Harris' Ferry in boats and flats to seek protection from the enemy. Matthew Smith, writing from Paxtang, July 12th, says,—

"I am this moment arrived at Harris' Ferry, and just now behold the greatest scene of distress I ever saw; the numerous poor ran away from their habitations, and left their all, and several families lost, part killed and scalped on their retreat; the most cruel butcheries ever known are practiced; wounded and others thrown into fires while yet living. The inhabitants, however, are much distressed; the Wyoming people are undoubtedly, by last accounts, entirely defeated. Northumberland county is evacuated. Not more than one hundred men with Col. Hunter at Sunbury; the Blue Mountain (five miles above Harrisburg) is now the frontier; and I am afraid Lancaster county will shortly follow the example of the other county. The stores at Carlisle are something very considerable. I doubt not their object is to destroy that place. I am informed there is not that care taken that should be. I think it would be necessary to appoint some careful officer at that place, that would do the duty more punctually.

"This party is large, having Col. Butler at their head, one hundred regular troops at first; about the same number of Tories, but is increased in two or three times that number; seven hundred Indians, all aroned in a most formidable manner, every one of them, exclusive of guns and tomahawks, as usual, each one has a large sponoon, and as soon as engaged, rushes on in a most dreadful manner. It is said they have field-pieces, or swivels, and a number of light horse.

"It is the earnest request of all friends of their country, as well as your humble servant, that something shall be done in the greatest haste. Be pleased to send an order for what arms are ready at Lancaster and Hommelstown, also for ammunition, and I shall exert every nerve in forwarding matters to the spot the men shall collect."

The year following another Indian maraud was feared, and the struggling settlers of Northumberland made an earnest appeal for succor. During the month of April the sixth class marched to Bedford County for the protection of the inhabitants there while putting in their spring crops. Orders were issued by Col. Robert Elder, sub-lieutenant of the county of Lancaster, to Capt. John Rutherford, who commanded the following detachments from the several companies mentioned, marched to Bedford, where they remained about six weeks, until relieved by ranging companies recruited for the purpose:

For the relief of the Northumberland people Col. Matthew Smith raised a company, and by a letter to President Reed, dated 3d of August, 1779, informs that functionary that he "had arrived at Sunbury with sixty Paxtang boys," and that "the neighboring townships turns out a number of volunteers. Cumberland County will give a considerable assistance; to-morrow at twelve o'clock is fixed for the time of march;" that "provisions is scarce," but that "they will follow the savages and hope to come at them, and if they do will give a good account."

In 1780, on the 1st of March, the Assembly of Pennsylvania passed an act for the abolition of slavery. A full reference with the law is given in the history of Lebanon County. To William Brown, of Paxtang, much credit is due for this humane measure. In 1777, in the first Assembly under the State Constitution, he proposed a similar law, which was at the period referred to enacted. The record of the slaves then held in this county is herewith given:

The rolls of companies of soldiers in the various regiments of the Pennsylvania Line after 1776 are very imperfect or not in existence, which is greatly to be regretted. Dauphin County men are scattered in most of the commands, especially in the artillery and German regiments, and it is a difficult matter at this late day to designate all. In Col. Thomas Hartley's regiment, one of the additional battalions ordered by Congress, we find the company of Capt. Archibald McAllister, a roll of which we have compiled from that officer's account-book:

In the early part of the year 1781, the Tories of South Carolina and Georgia, by the aid of British dragoons under Tarleton, created great distress in many sections of those colonies. They held cruel sway, killing such of the male inhabitants who were Whigs, burning their dwellings, and driving the women and children from those sections, who fled to Maryland and Pennsylvania. Such was the destitute condition of these people that prompt measures were taken for their relief by the various county committees. Paxtang township was appealed to by the chairman of the Lancaster committee, but although "silver and gold they had none," they gave of their substance. Several loads of flour and other provisions were procured and hauled to Philadelphia from Frey's and Elder's mills. The following letter, written in reply to the committee's request, is sufficiently explanatory. It was, as we have stated, followed by a liberal offering:

"PAXTANG, 10th October, 1781.

"SIR:—On the Rect. of yours, I communicated the matter to a number of the Inhabitants of the Township, who seem'd willing to comply with the benevolent design, and to contribute freely to the Relief of the distressed Exiles from the States of South Carolina and Georgia. But as the Inhabitants are not possessed of hard money, we concluded that an attempt to raise a Contribution in that way would be to no purpose, we agreed to consult some friends in Philada. whether a quantity of wheat or flour would answer the end; and as soon as an answer is Rec'd from Towa we intend to forward this matter with the utmost dispatch. I am, Sir, with great esteem, Yr. most obed't and very humble Servt.

"JOHN ELDER.

"JASP'N YEATS, Esq. in Lancaster."

The Indians in the spring of 1781 were again threatening the West Branch Valley, and to afford the inhabitants protection, Capt. John Rutherford's company, of Paxtang, and Capt. Martin Weaver's, of Upper Paxtang, were ordered to their relief until the spring planting should be completed. They were absent one month. The muster-roll of the former has been given. That of Capt. Weaver's is as follows. Capt. Weaver was connected with Capt. Matthew Smith's company of 1775, and probably was among those who returned home sick from Boston, as he seems to have been second lieutenant in Capt. Deibler's company in the spring of 1776. We regret we are unable to give the roll of the company as organized in 1778-79. The descendants of the Hoffmans, Deiblers, Sallada, Steever, Seal, and others, whose names are enrolled among these heroes of the "times which tried men's souls," will no doubt be gratified to learn of the valor, the bravery, and undying courage of their ancestors. As they read over these names, let their hearts be imbued with the lofty spirit of patriotism which fired the souls of their forefathers, and cherish faithful remembrance of their glorious deeds of a century ago, in behalf, not of themselves, but of posterity.

The campaign of 1781 terminated with the surrender of Cornwallis' army at Yorktown, as did also the war for independence. Dauphin County was well represented in that battle. One brave soldier at least became conspicuous. In Feltman's diary of the Pennsylvania Line at the siege of Yorktown, under date of Oct. 19, 1781, it is recorded:

"At one o'clock this day Maj. Hamilton with a detachment marched into town and took possession of the batteries and hoisted the American flag." This gallant officer, James Hamilton, was commissioned captain in the First Pennsylvania, Continental Line, March 10, 1776; made a prisoner of war Nov. 2, 1777; subsequently exchanged and promoted major of the Second Pennsylvania Dec. 10, 1778, and retired the service Jan. 1, 1783. The parents of Maj. Hamilton came from the North of Ireland with the Callouns, Polks, and other emigrants who located on the Swatara and its branches about 1730-35. At the close of the war for independence, Maj. Hamilton was in the Southern Department. There he married Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas Lynch, Sr., whose son, Thomas Lynch, Jr., was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence from South Carolina. Their son, Gen. James Hamilton, was Governor of South Carolina, 1830-32. He married a granddaughter of Thomas Hayward, who was also a signer.

It may naturally be supposed there was great rejoicing at the Yorktown capitulation. A letter from John Harris to Col. John Montgomery, of Carlisle, giving him the news of Cornwallis' surrender, brief though it be, expresses the jubilant feeling prevailing:

"PAXTANG, Oct. 27, 1781.

"SIR,—We have good news from the southward. Cornwallis and his whole army surrendered to Gen. Washington on the 19th. As soon as we get up the Province cannon we will fire a feu de joey. The bearer is waiting and I must close.

"Your very h'ble servt.,

"JOHN HARRIS."

On the 7th of November, 1782, John Dickinson, the author of the "Farmer's Letters," and at the outset of the Revolution one of the most energetic in the cause of American rights, was elected by the Assembly of the State and the Supreme Executive Council President of the State of Pennsylvania under the Constitution of 1776. Although Mr. Dickinson was foremost in the defense of the liberties of the colonies, when the resolutions for independence came before the Continental Congress, he believed, and no doubt sincerely, too, that the "Declaration" was premature, and was one of the members who was not returned to Congress by the Convention of July 15, 1776. There is no doubt that, had he been chosen, his name would have been affixed to that instrument. His course during the debates on Mr. Lee's resolve made him unpopular, and for several years he was not in active life. Nevertheless, he was not an idle spectator, and in October, 1777, he was made a brigadier-general in the Pennsylvania militia, having previously been in command of a Philadelphia battalion doing active service in the Jerseys during Washington's campaign there. It was at this period that the officers of the Lancaster battalion became acquainted with the statesman, Dickinson. Gen. Dickinson, in 1779, was chosen by Delaware as one of her representatives in the Confederated Congress, and in 1781 he was President of that State. In obedience to the call from Pennsylvania, he accepted its Presidency, when at once it was maliciously reported that he was inimical to the independence of the States. At this juncture his compatriots in arms sought his defense. The Ninth Battalion, commanded by Col. John Rodgers, of Hanover, as brave and gallant an officer as ever wielded a sword, met and issued the following:

"HANOVER, November 28, 1782.

"To the Colonels of the Lancaster County Militia:

"DEAR SIR: The officers and representatives of the ninth battalion of Lancaster County militia, upon consultation, have concluded, from the complexion of the present House of Assembly, that the Constitution and Liberty of the State are at stake in some measure, and sensible of the importance of what has cost us so much blood and treasure, we have thought it incumbent upon us to exert ourselves for their preservation as far as our influence extends, and to warn all who would wish to be free from the dangers that seem to impend, not doubting at the same time but you are ready to take the alarm, as you must be sensible of the same danger. We do not think it necessary to multiply words tending to inspire your spirit, for we are of opinion that you possess the same and have been only waiting to know the sentiments of your fellow friends to Liberty. Let us not then coolly and simply suffer any of our rights to be taken from us by any men, especially as our Constitution invests us with full power to oppose any such attempt. Perhaps our fears are groundless; but in case of apparent danger, which undoubtedly is our present case, a wise man will be on his guard; and therefore let such a number of persons as you will please to appoint meet us at Manheim on the 15th day of January next, in order that we may manfully contrive such measures as may have a tendency to preserve our good and estimable Constitution, and our dear Independence and sweet Liberty. Be active and do not fail to fulfill our request. By order of the whole.

"JOHN RODGERS, Colonel."

"In pursuance of the foregoing circular, the deputies from the different battalions met at Manheim, on the 15th of January following. There were present at that meeting the following:

"Colonels.—Thomas Edwards, Zeigler, Alexander Lowry, George Ross, John Rodgers, and Robert Elder.

"Majors.—Jacob Cook, Kelly, Hays, and Herr.

"Captains.—Ewing, Joseph Hubble, and Laird.

"Mr. Clark, and Mr. Chambers.

"On motion, Colonel Rodgers was unanimously chosen Chairman and Captain Joseph Hubble, Secretary.

"Colonel Rodgers made a neat and appropriate speech explaining the objects of the meeting, that a rumor was in circulation calculated to do much injury, 'that the President of the State of Pennsylvania was hostile to the Independence of America.'

"On motion, this question was put to each battalion:

"Is it the opinion of the members present that they approve of the appointment of John Dickinson, Esq., as President of the State of Pennsylvania, or not?"

"Answer. The members of the Second Battalion are unanimously of the opinion that a better choice of a President could not be made.

"Colonel Zeigler—same opinion.

"Seventh Battalion—Same.

"Eighth Battalion—Same.

"Ninth Battalion—We hope the Assembly have made a good choice, and if they have we thank them.

"Colonel Elder agrees in opinion with the Ninth.

"The following resolves, after being duly prepared and unanimously agreed to, were ordered to be forthwith communicated to the Assembly, the Supreme Executive Council, and to every battalion in the State.

"Resolved, unanimously, That the people have a right to assemble together for their common good, to instruct our Representatives, and to apply to the Legislature for redress of grievances, by address, petition, or remonstrance.

"Resolved, unanimously, That in the opinion of the deputies from the different battalions now met, that the complexion of the present House of Assembly is such that we have no reason to doubt that the Independence and Constitution of this State are safe, and that we highly approve of the appointment of his Excellency John Dickinson, Esq., as President.

"Resolved, unanimously, That we approve of Colonel Rodgers' calling this meeting, as it has tended to remove doubts and unjust charges that were in circulation to the disadvantage of his Excellency the President of this State, and two of our Members of Congress, James Wilson and John Montgomery, Esquires; and we conceive such meetings have a tendency to suppress false and malicious reports, and that thereby virtue may meet with its just reward and vice be depicted in its true deformity.

"JOHN RODGERS, Chairman.

"J. HUBLEY, Secretary."

A history of the struggle for independence would be imperfect without some reference to the war-measures of the government, the most important of which was the issuing of the so-called Continental money. When the Congress began to feel in sore need of funds it adopted the device, so dear to the ignorant heart, of "making money." One patriotic member declared that he would never consent to tax the people as long as he could "get a cartload of money by simply going to the printing office for it." Ignorance like this gave birth to the Continental currency. The Congress solemnly resolved that the stuff it had printed "ought to pass current in all payments and dealings, and be deemed equal in value to the Spanish milled dollars. The currency did what it ought to for nearly eighteen months. Until fourteen million dollars had been issued there was no great depreciation. Prices rose, but only a trifle. Early in 1777, however, this limit was passed; five million dollars more was printed off, and the whole volume of the currency sank sixty-six per cent. below par. This shrinkage must be something of a puzzle to inflationists of to-day, for all the conditions which they deem necessary to be observed in issuing paper were true of our forefathers' rag-money. The Continental bills were based on the faith and resources of the country. Congress, early in 1777, called public attention to the fact that the people were bound to redeem the currency according to the full value expressed in the respective bills. Moreover, the State Legislatures passed laws inflicting penalties and forfeitures upon persons who sold anything for these bills without taking them at par, and they were solemnly declared to be "a lawful tender" for all debts. Nevertheless, they went steadily down. Aug. 15, 1777, an issue of one million dollars enabled the authorities to buy three hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars' worth of gold. Nov. 7, 1777, an issue of the same amount passed current for only two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in cash. By April, 1778, one gold dollar was worth six in paper. The military successes of the year and the aid given by France caused a tiny appreciation. In November, 1778, Congress got nearly one million seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of ammunition for only ten million dollars in paper. This showed a depreciation of only eighty-three per cent. But in May, 1779, ten million dollars' of new paper brought only four hundred and sixteen thousand dollars in cash. Twenty-four dollar bills were worth only one real dollar. In November matters were still worse. An issue of ten million dollars brought less than two hundred and sixty thousand dollars in cash. A year from this date the paper dollar, based on the faith and resources of the whole country, was worth just one cent. In May, 1781, it was worth one-fifth of a cent. These figures are taken from a table compiled by Thomas Jefferson. A writer in the Philadelphia Packet, in 1780, says, "I had money enough to buy a hogshead of sugar. I sold it again and got a good deal more money than it cost me; yet what I sold for when I went to market again would buy but a tierce. I sold that, too, for a good deal of profit, yet the whole of what I sold it for would afterwards buy a barrel. I have now more money than I ever had, and yet I am not so rich as when I had less. I am sure we shall grow poorer and poorer unless we fall on some method to lower prices, and then the money we have to spare will be worth something."

On the 12th of March the first news was received of the signing of the treaty of Nov. 30, 1782, acknowledging the independence of the United States. This was the first measure necessary in the negotiations for peace between all the belligerents. On the 20th of January, 1783, the preliminary treaty of peace was signed. On the 11th of April Congress issued a proclamation enjoining a cessation of hostilities, and on the 16th of the same month the Supreme Executive Council made public announcement of the happy event at the court-house at Philadelphia. The State flag was hoisted, church bells were rung, and expressions of joy at the happy relief from the miseries of war, were universal.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Formation of the County of Dauphin—Remonstrances Against—Act for Erection of—The County in 1789—Opposition to the Federal Constitution.

A PROPOSITION to divide the county of Lancaster was discussed about the commencement of the Revolution, but that ordeal of arms for several years quieted the agitation for the formation of a new county. When, towards the close of the war, the courts were crowded with business, when military fines were being sued out against non-associators, compelling many of the citizens from remote sections of the county to appear at the county town, the question of the formation of a new county embracing that portion of Lancaster County north of the Conewago with a portion of the county of Berks, seriously disturbed not only the citizens of both counties, but the Assembly, and petitions pro and con were frequently presented. The county of Berks was early in the field; they were not in favor of a dismemberment, and at the session of 1782 several remonstrances bearing upon this point had the effect of confining the new county enterprise to Lancaster County alone. At the ensuing session of the Assembly the subject of a division was again agitated, when the following petition, prepared by Judge Jasper Yeates, of Lancaster, was presented. The remonstrance, however, is only worth preserving as a part of the history of those times:

"To the Honorable the Representatives of the Freemen of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met:

"The Remonstrance and Petition of Divers Freeholders and Others, Inhabitants of the County of Lancaster, Most Humbly Sheweth:

"That your petitioners conceive themselves bound to remonstrate against the prayers of two petitions proposed to the Legislature at the last session respecting a division of the said county of Lancaster, and beg leave to suggest to your Honorable Body the following remarks:

"That a frequent division of counties must naturally occasion a distrust in the faith of government—persons who, confiding in the acts of the Legislature, having purchased landed property near a county town long established by law, suffering considerable losses from such division.

"That the creating new counties necessarily tends to increase the public expenses, and to derange in some sort the policy of a government.

"That nothing but the most manifest public expedience arising from the welfare of the community at large, independent of individual interests, can justify such measures in an old established county; and that though the bringing the courts of justice near to the doors of every man may in some wise conduce to his private interests, yet in other instances a remoteness of the station may be in some degree advantageous, as it tends to repress a litigious spirit in many who might be desirous of vexing their neighbors at law at a much less expense.

"Your petitioners beg leave further to observe, that as to the petition which points out the precise limits of a new county attaching thereto a part of Berks county, your petitioners concur fully in the state of facts submitted to your honorable House by the inhabitants in general of the said county of Berks in their late petition and remonstrance, to which we humbly refer you.

"As to the erecting of a county town at Harris' Ferry, we submit to the wisdom of the Legislature the propriety, expedience or justice of the measure. If a central situation has been ever deemed most eligible and convenient to the public at large for the site of a county town, the spot proposed is deficient in this particular, the western boundary not exceeding one mile. If the trade of the back country on the Susquehanna is the real object of the petitioners, the streams of traffic will equally find their way to the capital of the State, whether there be a new county town erected pursuant to their wishes or not; and if the inhabitants who live beyond Peter's Mountain find themselves aggrieved by their remote situation, it is submitted to the Legislature whether it would not be more natural and easy to attach that settlement to Northumberland county. It is apprehended with due deference to the sense of your Honorable House, that measuring the petition for a county town at Harris' Ferry by the large scale of national good, and detracting therefrom a few individual interests, the prayer of that petition will be thought utterly inadmissible.

"Your petitioners take the liberty of adding that the present bounds of the county of Lancaster are not found to be inconvenient or unreasonable.

"That it will be utterly impracticable by the House to gratify the wishes of individuals in every instance when they complain of being aggrieved.

"And that when the division of counties is forced as a measure, of course your Honorable House will have much of their time engrossed by petitions for such divisions from the interested views of private people, which the claims of the public demand for objects of much greater magnitude.

"That in the present exhausted state of the country at large, when the public demands occasion the levying of heavy taxes, it would be highly grievous to many that new assessments should be laid for the purpose of building court-house and jail, and other expenses incident to a new county; for though many have signed the petition, it may fairly be presumed there are many others within the several districts averse to such additional impositions.

"Whereupon your petitioners most humbly pray that your Honorable Body, upon full deliberation had of the two petitions herein first before noted, will not grant the prayers thereof or either of them."

That portion of the proposed new county in and around Middletown and at Lebanon were also opposed to the new county if Harris' Ferry was to be the county-seat. We have referred elsewhere to the opposition from Lebanon. The following memorial of the inhabitants of Middletown is herewith given. It must be acknowledged there was some grounds for the course taken, as the latter place was a village of considerable size, and of unusual business importance, while Harrisburg contained only a handful of people, and at that period was of little account. The memorial reads,—

"To the Honorable the Representatives of the Freemen of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly: The petition of the inhabitants of LANCASTER COUNTY humbly sheweth, That

"WHEREAS, The said county being very extensive, and the increase of the inhabitants becomes very great, renders the attendance upon courts and other business burdensome and expensive to your petitioners, occasioned by their situation being so far distant from the county town. And whereas, It seems to be the intension of a respectable number of the inhabitants of the county to make application to the honorable house for redress of this burdensome grievance, to have the county divided into two separate counties for the ease and welfare of the said inhabitants; and when any grievances or inconveniences arise to the inhabitants of the State, petition to the honorable house is the mode to make them known to your honors; and as by experience we are made sensible of your strong inclination to remove any inconvenience that at any time and from time to time may arise to your constituents; you first being made sensible that the inconvenience complained of is real and well founded, and if you should be of opinion, after mature consideration, that it is real and well founded, we make no doubt but that you would permit us humbly to intimate to you our ideas of the mode of relief which we would beg leave to do, leaving the ultimate determination to your better judgment. If you should think proper to divide the county we would presume to recommend the town of Middletown, in the lower end of Paxton township, as by far the most proper place for the county town for many clear and obvious reasons, which we think would naturally occur to the honorable house, but lest they should not, we beg to mention ours: First, Middletown will be as central as any other place that can be thought of. Then its situation upon the river Susquehanna, accommodated with the finest, indeed, we may venture to say, the only fine safe harbor upon the said river, and the public utility of the said river Susquehanna to the State of Pennsylvania and to the city of Philadelphia in particular, is unquestionable; that river being a fine navigable river for boats from ten to twelve tons burden coming down said river, the river Juniata and other streams leading into the Susquehanna some hundreds of miles, from a fine fertile country on all sides of the river; and we must further presume that the time is not far distant when a communication will be effected from this river to the western waters and the great Lake Erie, attended with very trifling land carriage between the heads of the two waters. Another great advantage to the State, and particularly to the city of Philadelphia, will naturally accrue, and that is instead of great quantity of produce of different kind being carried from the counties of York and Cumberland to the town of Baltimore, they will be carried through the channel of the town of Middletown to the city of Philadelphia. It may not be improper to observe that Middletown is situated at the very lowest end of the navigable water of said river Susquehanna, so that the trade of that extensive river will at all events centre in that town and be carried from thence to the city of Philadelphia, and consequently will draw off from the city a very considerable quantity of merchandises of all kinds to the new county upon and beyond the Susquehanna River. And, further, that it is not improbable that in time the trade will be carried from Middletown to the city of Philadelphia, by water carriage, via the river Swatara and other waters to the river Schuylkill, as we stand informed that this water communication was viewed some years ago by a number of gentlemen of eminence appointed by the House of Assembly for that purpose and reported very practicable. And also that Middletown has the great advantage of being seated upon such high ground that they need never to be apprehensive of an inundation even in the lowest part of the town by the overflowing of Susquehanna and Swatara Rivers.

"That the honorable house may appoint Middletown for the county town is the earnest desire of your petitioners, and by granting the same we as in duty bound shall ever pray, etc.

The memorials were of no avail, however, and the subject being constantly brought to the attention of the Assembly, that body by its act of March 4, 1785, passed the following act, erecting the county of Dauphin and fixing the county-seat at Harris' Ferry :

" AN Act for erecting part of the County of Lancaster, into a separate County.

" Whereas, The inhabetance of the upper part of Lancaster County have by Petition set forth to the General Assembly of this State that they have long labored under many inconveniences from their being situated at so great a distance from the seat of Judicature in the said County, and have prayed that they may be relieved from the said inconveniences by erecting them into a separate County, and as it appears but just and reasonable that they should be relieved in the premises.

" Be it therefore enacted and it is hereby enacted by the Representatives of the Freeman of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and by the Authority of the same, That all that part of Lancaster County lying within the Bounds and limits hereafter described shall be erected into a separate County,—that is to say, beginning on the west side of the River Susquehanna, opposite the mouth of Conawago Creek ; thence up the middle of said Creek to Moors Hill; and from thence to the head of said creek ; and from thence by a direct Line to the South East Corner of Heidelberg Township, where it strikes the Berks County line; thence north west by the Line of Berks County to Mahantango Creek ; thence along the same by the Line of Northumberland County and Crossing the River Susquehanna to the Line of Cumberland County ; thence down the Susquehanna on the West Side thereof by the line of Cumberland County, and that part of the Line of York County to the place of beginning, on the west side of the river Susquehanna, to be henceforth known and called by the name of Dauphin County.

" And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That the inhabitants of the said County of Dauphin shall at all times hereafter enjoy all and singular the Jurisdiction, Powers, Rights, Liberties, and privileges whatsoever which the inhabetance of any other County of this State do, may, or ought to enjoy by the Constitution and Laws of this State.

" And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the district elections for the said County of Dauphin shall be held for the Townships of Derry and Loudoderry at Hummels Town in the township of Derry aforesaid, for the township of upper Paxtang on the north side of Peter's Mountain at Peter Hoffman's in said township, for the township of Lower Paxtang on the South side of Peter's Mountain, and West Hanover at the Court House of the said County, or at John Harris' until such Court House shall be erected, and for the Townships of Lebanon, East Hannover, Heidelberg, and Bethel at the Town of Lebanon in the said Township of Lebanon, Where they shall elect at the times and under the Regulations stipulated and directed by the Constitution and Laws of this State, a Councillor Representative to serve them in General Assembly, Consors, Sheriff, Coroners, and Commissioners, which said Officers when duly elected and qualified shall have and enjoy all and singular such powers, Authorities, and privileges with respect to their said County as such officers elected in and for any other County, may, can, or ought to do. And the said Election shall be Conducted in the same manner and from and Agreeable to the same rules and regulations as now are or hereafter may be in force in the other Counties of this State.

" And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That the said County of Dauphin shall elect four members, and the County of Lancaster shall elect seven Members to represent them respectively in the General Assembly of this Commonwealth from and after the passing of this Act until the same shall be altered agreeable to the Constitution and the Laws of this State.

" And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the Justices of the Supreme Court of this State shall have like Powers, Jurisdictions, and Authorities in the said County of Dauphin as in the other Counties of this State, and are hereby authorized and impowered to Deliver the Gaoles of the said County of Dauphin of Capital and other offenders in like manner as they are authorized to do in other Counties of this State.

" And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That the Justices of the Courts of quarter Sessions and Common pleas now commissioned within the Limits of the County of Dauphin and those that may hereafter be Commissioned, or any three of them, shall and may hold Courts of General quarter Sessions of the Peace, and Gaol Delivery, and County Courts for holding of pleas, and shall have all and singular such powers, rights, Jurisdictions, and Authorities, to all intents and purposes, as other Justices of the Courts of General quarter Sessions and Justices of the County Courts for holding of pleas in the other Counties of this State may, can, or ought to have in their respective Counties, which Courts shall sit and be held for the said County of Dauphin, near Harris's Ferry, on the third tuesday in the months of February, May, August, and november yearly for the dispatch of the publick Business of the said County.

" And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful to and for Jacob Aw, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowdan, and William Brown, of Paxtang, or any three of them to take assurance to them and their heirs of such Lot or pieces of Ground as shall be laid out and approved of by the said Commissioners or any three of them for the erecting a Court House and Gaol thereupon, in trust and for the use of the inhabitants of the said County of Dauphin, and thereupon to erect a Court house and prison sufficient to accommodate the publick Service of the said County.

" And be it further enacted by the authorities aforesaid, That for the discharging the charges of building, erecting, and finishing the Court house and Prison aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful to and for the Commissioners and Township assessors of the said County or a Majority of them to assess and levy, and they are hereby required to assess and levy in the manner directed by the act for raising County Rates and levies to such money as the said Trustees or any three of them shall judge necessary for building and finishing the Court house and prison aforesaid, Provided always that the sum of money so to be raised do not exceed the sum of fifteen hundred Pounds, and that the said Trustees shall from time to time render a faithful account of the expenditures of the same not only to the Commissioners, but the Grand Jury of the County when called on, or any other officer may be appointed by Authority for the inspection of the accounts of the County. Provided also and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no action or suit now commenced or that may be commenced in the County Courts of Lancaster before the first day of April next against any Person living within the bounds of the County of Dauphin, shall be stayed or discontinued by this act or by anything in the same Counties, but the same actions now commenced or that may be commenced as aforesaid may be proceeded to final issue and Judgement thereupon rendered in the like manner as if this act had not been made, and it shall be lawful for the Justices of Lancaster County to issue Process to the Sheriff of the County of Lancaster for carrying on and obtaining the full and Legal effects of such suits in the same manner as if the parties resided in the same County of Lancaster.

" And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the Sheriff, Coroners, and public officers of the County of Lancaster shall continue to exercise the duties of their respective Offices within the County of Dauphin until similar Officers are appointed agreeable to Law, within the said County of Dauphin, and that all arrearages of excise and public Taxes shall be paid into the hands of the present Collectors to be by them accounted for in manner and form as if this act had never been passed.

" And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the Sheriffs, Treasurers, Collectors of Excise, and all such Officers as have heretofore usually given bill for the faithful discharge of their respective Offices who may hereafter be appointed or elected in the said County of Dauphin before they or any of them shall enter upon the execution of their respective Offices shall give sufficient security in the like sums in the like manner and form and for the like uses, trusts, and purposes as such Officers are obliged by Law for the time being to do in the County of Lancaster.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That Joshua Elder, Thomas Clark, John Glendellor, Bartram Galbraith, James Cunningham, or any three of them shall be Commissioners to run and mark the County Line, in the same manner as is before in the second section of this act, which line when so run and marked shall be the boundary between the Counties aforesaid, and that the said Commissioners shall receive for their Services at the rate of twenty-two shillings and sixpence per day each, and no more, to be paid half by the County of Lancaster, and half by the County of Dauphin by draughts from the Commissionsers of the respective Counties on the Treasurer of the same, which the said Commissioners are hereby authorised and directed to grant.

"Signed by order of the House.

"JOHN BAYARD, Speaker.

"Enacted into a Law at Philadelphia on Friday, the fourth Day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty five.

"Inrolled 4th June, A.D. 1785."

The name DAUPHIN was derived from the eldest son of the king of France, that country at this period, in consequence of its efficient aid to the colonies, being uppermost in the affections of the people. The enthusiasm was unbounded, and, as we shall refer to hereafter, carried to extreme lengths. The name was suggested by the prime movers for the formation of the new county. The seat of justice was fixed at Harris' Ferry, then a village of about one hundred houses, although the towns of Lebanon and Middletown were then more important places within the new county. A letter written about this period by Capt. Alexander Graydon to Jedediah Morse, the geographer, gives us perchance the best account of the county of Dauphin as then organized, extant, and we present it therefore in full :

"LOUISBOURG, March 5th, 1789.

SIR: A Harry of Business added to a want of Health has hitherto prevented me from paying that Attention I could have wished to your Questions respecting the County of Dauphin. I now give you the Result of my Enquiries upon the different heads you propose, arranged in the order of your Queries.

"Answer to 1st Qn. Dauphin, formerly contained within the Limits of Lancaster county, but divided from it and erected into a separate County by Act of Assembly passed March 4th 1785.

"Answer to 2d Qn. Its Boundaries on the West and South West are the Western Shore of the River Susquehanna (the River being within the Limits and Jurisdiction of the County) on the South East Conaway Creek as far as the Head of it and from thence running in a direct Line to the south East Corner of Heidelberg Township where it strikes the Berks County Line thence north West by the Line of Berks County to Mahantango Creek thence along the same by the Line of Northumberland and crossing the Susquehanna to the Line of Cumberland County. It is thus described in the Act of Assembly, but perhaps it may be best for your purpose to say, That it is bounded on the West and south West by the Counties of Cumberland and York, on the South and South East by Lancaster County—on the East & North East by Berks and on the north by Northumberland, the greater and best part of the County lying in the valley between the Blue or Kittatiny Mountain, and the Conaway Hill or South Mountain, which latter Name it obtains in Cumberland County. Its form is triangular and its Extent along the Susquehanna about forty-five miles from thence to the Line of Berks County about thirty-five Miles and from thence to the same River along the Line of Berks and Northumberland Counties about fifty-five miles.

"Answer to 3d Qn. There are 3250 taxable Inhabitants in Dauphin from whence perhaps it may be estimated that there are not less than 16 or 18,000 souls. These consist with a very few Exceptions of German and Irish or what are in Pennsylvania called Scotch Irish and their descendants. I think about two-thirds of the Inhabitants are Germans or of that Extraction. The principal religious denominations among them are Lutherans and Calvinists perhaps about an equal number of each—there is also a small Congregation of Moravians who have a place of worship about a mile from the Town of Lebanon. There are besides a good number of Menonists and a small Society of Roman Catholics who have a Chapel in Lebanon Township.

"The religious Professors of the Irish families is the Presbyterian. They have three meeting houses, one in West Hanover, one in Paxtang and one in Derry Township. There are also a few Seceders and Covenanters who being too inconsiderable in number to form distinct societies have generally fallen in with the before mentioned Congregations. The English Episcopalian, Quakers, &c., of which we have a few are by no means numerous enough to have places of Worship.

"Answer to 4th Qn. The soil is generally good and in some parts remarkably fertile more particularly in Lebanon and Heidelberg Townships and in that part of Paxtang lying along the River. A great portion of the County is Line stone land but as it approaches the Kittatiny Mountain which runs through it a Distance of near thirty Miles it is generally a gravelly or light stony soil which however produces very good and certain Crops of excellent Wheat, Rye, &c. Beyond the mountain to Northumberland County, which Tract of County comprehends upper and middle Paxtang Township, the quality of the soil is much inferior to the other parts and is very little cultivated. It is generally timbered with pine & white oak and watered with a number of fine Streams which enable the Inhabitants to erect Saw Mills and drive on a very beneficial Trade in Boards, &c. but tho' the soil of this County is somewhat sandy & in other parts wet as may be inferred from the timber, yet it produces pretty good Grain and affords a great deal of good meadow Ground. From the best information I am inclined to think that the proportion of the Land under Cultivation will average at less than an half. The trade to Philadelphia and the Mills on the Road thither, our principal Export being Wheat and flour—we also export Bar Iron and the neighboring County is supplied with Boards, Scantling, &c., from Louisbourg and Middletown which are situated on or near Susquehanna, down which great quantities of these Articles are rafted in the Spring and Autumn at which Seasons the waters being high the navigation is rendered safe and easy. Our Exports (except what are taken off by the watermen who bring down Lumber and Grain) are conveyed by Land, the navigation of the Susquehanna being at present too much obstructed below Middletown by Rocks, Falls, &c. to make it eligible to convey them by Water to Baltimore and other Markets in the Chesapeake which may possibly be the case in future, when the County has ability to remove these Obstructions.

"Our chief Imports besides the Articles brought down the River as already mentioned are European and East and West India Merchandise brought from Philadelphia. The natural Growth of the Soil is generally Hickory, Oak, Chestnut, Poplar, and near the River Walnut, Locust, Linn or Linden, Maple, Ash, Beech, &c., with the Herbage usual to other parts of the State. Its productions from Culture are Wheat, Rye, Oats, Berley, Indian Corn, Flax, Hemp, &c.

"Answer to 5th Qn. The Rivers are the Susquehanna, the Swatara a large stream which has its source in Berks County and after watering a considerable Extent of Country in its windings empties into the Susquehanna at Middletown—the Quitapahilla which discharges itself into the Swatara, and the Tulpehocken which empties into Schuylkill (about a mile from Reading) between the Head waters of which (ie the Tulpehocken) and the Quitapahilla which approach within a mile of each other near the town of Lebanon it has been in Contemplation to cut a Canal and thereby by means of Locks, &c. to open a navigable Communication between the Schuylkill and Susquehanna, a work which though at present laid aside will probably one day be carried into Execution. There are besides these several less important Streams, vizt. Paxtang, Conaway, Spring Creek, Clark's Creek, Sturgeon's, Armstrong's, Beaver Creek, Monady, Wickonisky, little Swatara, &c. most of which afford seats for Mills & Every kind of water works.

"I know of nothing remarkable in the Mountains in which there are several in the County, vizt. the Blue Mountain already mentioned and several other Ridges in its Neighborhood such as Peter's Mountain, Berry's Mountain, &c., and the Conaway Hill, in which there is a Mine of Iron Ore belonging to the Estate of the late Mr. Grubb (part whereof is in Lancaster Co'ty) which appears to be inexhaustible.

"There is a Spring near the foot of the Blue Mountains much celebrated and resorted to by the Country People on Account of its supposed Efficacy in the Cure of Rheumatic and other chronic Disorders, but from what I can learn if it possesses any virtue it arises chiefly from its excessive coldness.

"There is also a Cave on the Banks of the Swatara about a mile from Hummel's town in Derry Township deemed a great Curiosity by those who have seen it. Its Aperture being under a pretty high Bank is from 15 to 20 feet wide and from 7 to 10 in Height. You enter by a gradual Descent and in your Progress pass through a number of Passages and Apartments of various Dimensions, some low and narrow others very high and spacious, vaulted by magnificent Canopies fretted with a variety of depending Petrifications, some of which are drawn to a great Length by means of their continued Exhalation. But much of their original Beauty and Transparency is obscured by the smoke of their Torches from time to time employed in conducting the curious Traveller through this gloomy recess. From the Entrance of the Cavern to a small Fissure or Outlet at the Extremity which is barely large enough to admit the Body of a Man is about 200 yards measured in a straight Line on the surface of the Ground under which it passes, but the Distance must be much greater to those who have the Courage to trace it in its entranced Windings. This is the only natural Curiosity in the County that I have heard of, and I know of no Antiquities or artificial ones.

"Answer to 6th Qn. The Country was first settled by Emigrants from Ireland.

"Answer to 7th Qn. The state of Agriculture is much the same as in the neighboring Counties & will doubtless admit of much Improvement. The same may be said of the Manufactures, though some Branches seem to merit a particular mention vizt. A sail factory at Louisburgh which is carried on by means of a stamping Machine much cheaper and more expeditiously than in the usual mode of drawing—Also a Powder Mill of Lebanon Township in which is manufactured Powder of a very Superior Strength and Quality. Besides these I cannot omit a Grist Mill within a Mile of Middletown seated very advantageously on the Swatara & about half a mile from the mouth of it. It is a very large and handsome stone Building, has four pair of Stones and is perhaps in every respect one of the most complete in Pennsylvania. But what is perhaps more deserving of Attention is the Race a Canal from twenty to thirty feet in Breadth and carried with such a degree of Boldness to a Length of 476 perches through Rocks and Hills and every Obstacle which occurred in its Course as cannot fail to excite a very high Idea of the enterprising Spirit & persevering Industry of Mr. George Frey, the undertaker and owner.

"We have as yet no Academy or public schools but shall in common with the other Counties of the State have a Tract of Land granted & appropriated by the Legislature for the Establishment of one, besides which we are entitled to the annual proceeds of a Ferry across the Susquehanna at present rented for £155 per Ann which should it (as in all probability it will) be applied to this Use will constitute a very respectable Fund.

"Answer to 8th Qn. The County comprehends ten Townships vizt. Paxton (or Paxtang which is the original Indian name), upper Paxtang, Middle Paxtang, East Hanover, West Hanover, Derry, Londonderry, Lebanon, Bethel, and Heidelberg—and ten Towns, vizt. Louisbourg or Harrisburgh containing about 130 dwelling-houses, a Gaol being a plain stone Building and a German Church a Log Building—Lebanon containing about 180 Houses and two German Churches built of Wood. Middletown containing 90 old Houses & one German Church of Wood. Hummel's town containing about 35 Houses & one German Church of Wood—Anville or Miller's town containing about 35 houses; Heidelberg, or Shaffer's town containing about 70 Houses & 2 German Churches one of which is a handsome stone Building—Newman's town containing about 25 houses—Williamsburg or Jones' town containing about 40 houses and one German of Wood. N. B. In Lebanon one of the Churches belongs to the Lutheran the other to the Calvinists, so in Heidelberg, but in the other Towns where there is but one, it generally belongs to both societies and is used by them alternately.

"Answer to 9th Qn. The Name of the principal Town or Seat of the Courts is Louisbourg so styled by the Supreme Executive Council in their proceedings as well as in those of the Courts, altho' it is more generally known by the name of Harrisburgh—it is a fine, flourishing place & its progress amazing, having been laid out a little better than 3 years. It lies between the 40th and 41st degree of Latitude and is somewhat more than a degree & a half West of Philada. its Distance from that place 100 Miles and its Bearing about West and by North.

"This is the most accurate Information I could obtain with respect to the Objects of your Inquiry. I have probably been more minute than necessary in some Cases, but agreeably to your desire was willing to give as full an Answer as possible and shall be happy if it affords you any Assistance in your very useful Undertaking, in which I wish you Success, and "An Sir, Your very hble Servt,

"ALEX. GRAYDON.

"To Mr. JEDEDIAH MORSE."

At this period the entire country was seriously agitated by the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Within the limits of Dauphin County there was much opposition. In the convention which was called by the Pennsylvania Assembly to ratify that instrument, the delegates from Dauphin, William Brown, Adam Orth, and John A. Hanna, signed the protest that the Constitution, "consistent with its idea of consolidation, contains no reservation of the rights and privileges of the State governments," and the authority "vested in Congress is unlimited in its nature, nay is comprehensive and boundless."

On the 3d of September, 1788, there was held at Harrisburg a conference of those who were opposed to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The minutes of this conference, which marks an important epoch in the history of this locality and of the State, as it was the first political convention ever held in Pennsylvania, we give in full:

"Agreeably to a circular letter which originated in the county of Cumberland, inviting to a conference such of the citizens of the State who conceive that a revision of the Federal system, lately proposed for the government of the United States is necessary; a number of gentlemen from the city of Philadelphia and the counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Lancaster, Cumberland, Berks, Northumberland, Bedford, Fayette, Washington, Franklin, Dauphin, and Huntingdon have assembled at this place for said purpose."

Gallatin, of Westmoreland County, who seemed to be one of the leaders in this revolt, if so it may be termed, presented the following resolutions:

"1st. Resolved, That in order to prevent a dissolution of the Union, and to secure our liberties and those of our posterity, it is necessary that a revision of the Federal constitution be obtained in the most speedy manner.

"2d. That the safest manner to obtain such a revision will be, in conformity to the request of the State of New York, to use our endeavors to have a convention called as soon as possible; Resolved, therefore, that the Assembly of this State be petitioned to take the earliest opportunity to make an application for that purpose to the New Congress.

"3d. Resolved, That in order that the friends to amendments to the Federal Constitution, who are inhabitants of this State, may act in concert, it is necessary, and it is hereby recommended to the several counties in the State, to appoint committees, who may correspond one with another, and with such similar committees as may be formed in other States.

"4th. Resolved, That the friends to amendment to the Federal Constitution in the several States be invited to meet in a general conference to be held at —, on —, and — members elected by this conference who, or any of them, shall meet at said place and time, in order to devise, in concert with such other delegates from the several States as may come under similar appointments, on such amendments to the Federal Constitution as to them may seem most necessary, and on the most likely way to carry them into effect."

There seemed to be a diversity of opinion in the conference, and although the members did not actually reject Gallatin's resolves, which were much more decided, adopted those of a different temper and likely to be effective before the people. The object of the founders of a party, at the moment in hopeless minority, was to present a record upon which any aspiring politician could place himself. They were successful to such a degree that the destiny of the State and nation were in the party thus called into being for fifty years afterwards, almost without interruption. Whatever intermediate occurrences took place, deliberation announced the decision of the conference to be,—

"1st. Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of this State to acquiesce in the organization of the said government; but although we thus accord to its organization, we by no means lose sight of the grand object of obtaining very considerable amendment and alterations which we consider essential to preserve the peace and harmony of the Union, and those invaluable privileges for which so much blood and treasure have been recently expended.

"2d. Resolved, That it is necessary to obtain a speedy revision of said Constitution by a general convention.

"3d. Resolved, That, therefore, in order to effect this desirable end, a petition be presented to the Legislature of the State requesting that honorable body to take the earliest opportunity to make application for that purpose to the new Congress."

The address to the people of the State was brief, and in few words proceeds to state that the "Constitution in its present form contains some principles which may be perverted to the injury of the citizen and prove incompatible with order and government," expressing the opinion "that considerable amendments are essentially necessary;" further, that they are "sensible that a large number of the citizens, both in this and other States, who gave their assent to its being carried into execution previous to any amendments, were actuated more by fear of the dangers that might arise from any delays than by a conviction of its being perfect," concluding with the hope that "prudence and policy" will soon bring about the amendments which those with whom they were in harmony in other States "are pressing so earnestly."

Subsequently to the action of the "conference" its opponents issued a circular directing public attention to the fact that an election by general ticket for eight members of Congress was to be held on the fourth Wednesday of November, calling upon "the friends of the new Constitution to be on their guard, lest the names of persons opposed to the same or of doubtful sentiments should be circulated in the counties and in the city, especially let them beware of counterfeits, for such are abroad." The committees circulating this also informed the people that "the smuggling business which took place at Harrisburg with the ostensible purpose of procuring amendments to the Constitution, but in fact to form a ticket for representatives in Congress," should be watched!

On the 3d of November the Federalists, as they called themselves, met at Lancaster to form a ticket for members of Congress. This meeting did not openly attack the opponents of the Constitution. Indeed, so confident were they of success that it was not deemed dignified or in any way necessary to do so. But so unexpectedly strong was opposition developed, as the returns from "the back counties" reached Philadelphia, "that very great surprise was created at the course of public sentiment." And no wonder, for when all the returns came to hand it appeared that the voters were divided into two nearly equal parts, "giving most of the advantages of political success to those who favored amendments to the Constitution." The vote was as follows:

HARRISBURG TICKET.		LANCASTER TICKET.

In the history of the county of Lebanon we have referred to the construction of the Union Canal in full. In this connection we can only say that it extends from Middletown, on the Susquehanna River, to Reading, on the Schuylkill River, being seventy-nine miles in length, with a navigable feeder seven miles in length. There are fifty-four locks on the east, with a descent of three hundred and seven feet, and thirty-four locks on the west, with a descent of one hundred and ninety-three feet. There is a tunnel northwest of Lebanon seven hundred and twenty-nine feet in length, cut in the solid rock, and this was the first tunnel constructed in the United States. The summit was filled with water obtained from the Quitapahilla and Swatara Creeks, although other streams have been tapped.

The first survey of it was made in 1762, by David Rittenhouse and Dr. William Smith, although its feasibility is said to have been suggested by William Penn as early as 1690. In 1764 operations were commenced, and after many discouragements and financial disasters were completed in 1837, when the first boat, the "Alpha of Tulpehocken," passed Lebanon on its way westward. Identical with the completion and operation of this maritime highway the material prosperity of this county, and especially Lebanon dates. The population increased, business increased, and to it belongs the honor of laying the corner-stone of the prosperity of those sections which it traverses. It has lost the prestige of its commerce and importance, but is still a line of cheap transportation for coal, lumber, iron-ore, iron, and other manufacturing material. The railroads have succeeded it in the popular sense of quick transportation, but it forms a prominent part in the history of the Swatara Valley, and as such will always be held in grateful remembrance. Its first construction was made for boats of fifteen tons, but the enlargement between 1853 and 1857 gives a safe passage to boats of heavier capacities. It has the honor of being the first canal built in the country.

In the year 1793 occurred that terrible scourge the yellow fever at Philadelphia. The deaths were numerous, and many of the principal citizens of the metropolis fell victims to the epidemic. As is the case when yellow fever or cholera or other direful diseases prevail in a certain locality, places distant from the infected districts are affected by diseases somewhat allied to those of the more malignant type; and during this period Harrisburg, Columbia, Reading, and other towns, suffered severely. In the chapters devoted to Harrisburg we have referred to this matter in full.

The opposition to the excise law in Western Pennsylvania culminated in 1794 in what was termed the "Expedition to the Westward," or the Whiskey Insurrection. Troops were enrolled, and the county of Dauphin well represented. We fully expected to obtain complete rolls of the troops in the departments of Washington City, but investigation and research have not been successful. In the general pay-roll of the Second Regiment Pennsylvania Militia we have the following officers from this section:

Lieutenant-Colonel.

Thomas Forster.

Major.

Frederick Hummel.

Paymaster.

John Brown.

Sergeant-Major.

Philip Stoehr.

Capt. John Wallace's company consisted of one captain, one lieutenant, one ensign, four sergeants, two corporals, and thirty-two privates.

Capt. Samuel Ainsworth's company consisted of one captain, one lieutenant, one ensign, two sergeants, one corporal, and nineteen privates.

Capt. Devin's rifle company consisted of one captain, one lieutenant, four sergeants, four corporals, and thirty privates.

That there were other companies there is no doubt. We have the journal of Capt. Samuel Dewees, who was on the Western Expedition, and from this we gather many important facts. Dewees says,—

"Lawyers Fisher, Dentzel, Elder, and a storekeeper of the name of Reitzel, and others of the citizens were engaged in raising a volunteer military company. Lawyer Fisher was elected captain, Lawyer Dentzel ensign, Reitzel first lieutenant, and ——— second lieutenant. The company was a large one, and each member uniformed and equipped himself in handsome style. Capt. Fisher found out the residence of a drummer of the name of Warriour, who then lived some two or three miles from Harrisburg. Warriour had been a British drum-major, but had at an early stage of the Revolutionary struggle deserted from the British and joined himself to the Continental army, and had beat the drum for it until the end of the war. Warriour was chosen drum-major in Capt. Fisher's company, and I was chosen fife-major. Warriour was decidedly the best drummer that I had ever seen or heard beat during the Revolution. His music was not of the loudest kind, but it was sharp, clear, well-timed, and rich in its spirit-stirring melodies. Capt. Fisher's company was composed of the most patriotic, intelligent, respectable, and wealthy young men of Harrisburg and vicinity, who prided themselves very much in exercising and perfecting themselves in the school of the soldier.

"... Capt. Fisher received orders for his company to march on to Carlisle. We all got in readiness, paraded through the principal streets of Harrisburg, and then marched for Carlisle. When we left Harrisburg we crossed over the Susquehanna River in flats. These were a kind of boat twenty or thirty feet long and ten or twelve feet wide, with sides a foot and a half or two feet high. The banks of the river on the town side were covered with women and children, and there were great weeping and mourning. Our country called, and duty was clearly spread out before our eyes. We had, therefore, to steel our hearts against the cries of mothers and children, and have up against the tide of weeping and wailing by playing and beating up merrily 'Charley over the Water.' This we continued to do until Harrisburg was partly lost in the distance behind us."

As many of the incidents detailed in Dewees' account are new, and referable in the main to Capt. George Fisher's company, we make full extracts therefrom:

"... Upon our arrival at Carlisle we pitched our tents upon the 'commons' beyond the 'spring,' and very soon after the camp was formed ten or twelve men were detached from our company to join Gen. Washington's quarter-guard. President Washington had arrived but that day or the day previous at Carlisle. He had been there, however, several times previous to our marching thither. Warriour and myself played the detached portion of our company up to the court-house, where the general's quarter-guard was stationed, and then returned to camp.

"In a few days after our arrival at Carlisle, President Washington issued his orders for all to be in readiness to march. On the next or second day thereafter, in the morning, we were ordered to beat up the 'General.' This was a signal tune. As soon as we would commence to play it, all the men would set themselves about pulling up the tent-pins, and arranging matters for a general strike. At a certain roll in this tune (called the 'General'), all things being in readiness, the tents would be all thrown down in one direction, and all fall at once, in the same movement, or as nearly so as could be done. This done, some of the soldiers would then engage in rolling them up, whilst others would carry them to the wagons and pack them, camp-kettles, etc., therein. For the amusement and use of my young readers, I will here insert a part of two old verses (now recollected) which was set to the tune of the 'General':

"Come, brave boys, it is almost day, Strike your tents and march away."

"Don't you hear the general say,
Strike your tents and march away."

"After we had beaten up the 'General' our tents were all struck to the ground at the signal, rolled up, and they with all other camp equipage, packed in our baggage-wagon. When this task was accomplished, the long roll was then beat up, and all formed into line. The army then formed by regiments into marching order, then marched and formed the line in the main street of Carlisle. The regiment to which Capt. Fisher's company was attached, was formed in the main line of regiments, and upon the right of that line. Capt. Fisher's company occupying the right of that regiment, constituted the extreme right of the entire line, and rested in the main street, opposite the court-house. The rear of the main column or line rested at a great distance from town on the old Philadelphia road, and beyond the 'gallows ground.' This line, besides being formed preparatory to the march, was also established for the purpose of passing the review. All the officers were at their posts in front of the line in order to receive and salute the commander-in-chief and suite. President Washington, the Governors of States then at Carlisle, formed at the head of the line. The brigade and field officers that accompanied the President and Governors took their positions in the line preparatory to the review.

"All things being in readiness, the President and suite moved on to a review of the troops. The method of salute was, each regiment on the commander-in-chief and suite drew near was ordered to 'present arms.' Field officers, captains, lieutenants, etc., in line in advance of the troops saluted by bringing the hilts of their swords to their faces and then throwing the points of their swords towards the ground at some little distance from their bodies on their right side, the musicians at the same time playing and beating a salute. The flag-bearers at a certain roll of the drum would also salute by waving their colors and fro. The musicians in this grand line of military varied very much in their salutes. Some drummers no doubt knew what tune was a salute, and could have beaten it well, but their fifers could not play it, and some fifers knew how to play it, but their drummers could not beat it. An acquaintance of mine of the name of Shippey, who played the fife for a company from Philadelphia could have played it, and well too (for many a time we had played it together during the Revolution), but his drummer knew nothing about it. Some musicians played and beat one thing and some another. One fifer, I recollect (within hearing distance of us), played 'Yankee Doodle,' and his drummer no doubt beat it well too, but it was not a salute. When President Washington and his suite arrived at our regiment I struck up and Warriour beat the old 'British Grenadier's March,' which was always the music played and beat, and offered to a superior officer as a salute during the Revolutionary war.

"President Washington eyed us keenly as he was passing us, and continued to do so, even when he had passed to some distance from us. After this duty was performed, upon the part of the soldiery, Washington, in conversation with the officers, asked Capt. Fisher if his musicians (Warriour and myself) had not been in the Continental service during the Revolution? Capt. Fisher informed him that we had been; upon which the President replied that he had thought so, from the manner of playing and beating, and observed that we performed the best of any in the army, and were the only musicians that played and beat the old (or usual) revolutionary salute, which he said was as well played and beat as he had ever heard it during the Revolution. Capt. Fisher was very proud of our having so far excelled as to attain the just praise of the President, and said to us upon his return, 'Boys, you have received the praise of President Washington to-day for having excelled all of the musicians in the line in playing and beating up Washington's favorite revolutionary salute, for he says not a musician in the whole army has played it to-day but yourselves.' If Capt. Fisher was proud of Washington's commendation of us, my readers may judge that we were not less proud of it than himself.

"In the course of an hour or two after the troops had been reviewed by President Washington, at Carlisle, the order of 'forward' was given. The whole army then took up its line of march westward, and in the evening of that day it reached Mount Rock, and encamped. This place was about seven miles from Carlisle. The next day we passed through Shippensburg and reached Strasburg, at the foot of the mountain, where we encamped. I do not recollect whether we remained at this place longer than a night or not, but think that we were a day and two nights encamped there before we began to ascend the mountain.

"We broke our encampment at Strasburg and set out upon the march up the mountain. It is nothing to travel over the mountains now to what it was then; the roads were both narrow and steep, as well as crooked. Owing to the zigzag nature of the road, soldiers in the front could behold very many soldiers towards the rear, and the soldiers in the rear could behold many of the soldiers that marched between it and the front. This march not being a forced one, ample time was given us to ascend to its summit. Nature had strewn her moss-covered seats about in profusion upon its side, and we, grateful to her for the favor, occupied them often in our laborious journey, as well upon this mountain as others, upon all the other mountains which laid in our way between Cumberland Valley and Pittsburgh.

"Soon after our arrival at that place [Bedford], portions of our army were reorganized. Here we lost our captain (Fisher), who was promoted to the rank of major. Lient. Reitzel became our captain, and Ensign Dentezel became lieutenant. After these changes were made we had to hold an election for assign.

 "Shortly after this there was intelligence received that the 'Whiskey Boys' in great numbers were lying in ambush awaiting our approach. Some believed the report, others scouted at the idea. The whole army received an ample supply of ammunition. The rifle companies were ordered to mould a great many bullets, and much preparation was made to repel any attack which the insurgents might feel disposed to make. The orders to march upon a certain day were general. Each man drew a double or triple quantity of provisions, and received orders to cook the same.

"All things being in readiness, we then took up the line of march and pushed for the Allegheny Mountains. I do not recollect anything worthy of notice until we were descending the western base of the Allegheny Mountains in our approach to the 'Glades.' Here we had a hard time of it. It was now November, and the weather was not only quite cold but it was windy and rain was falling. By an oversight we were pushed on a considerable distance in advance of our baggage-wagons, and at length halted at an old waste barn that we supposed belonged to some one of the insurgents, for had it not been so our army would not have been permitted to burn the fences thereon. We collected rails and built fires, but owing to the rain and the marshy nature of that section of country, the ground around our fires with our continued tramping became quite mirey. . . .

"My readers may judge of the land's surface and of the state of the roads through the Glades when I inform them that when some of the wagons arrived in the forenoon at where we halted the night previous they had each from twelve to twenty horses attached to them, and the axle-trees were sweeping or shoving the mud and water before them as they moved onwards. None but regular wagoners could have navigated these mud swamps, and none but regular teamsters or men acquainted with bad roads or roads in their worst state can conceive the impassable state of the roads through the Glades in the year 1794. . . .

"We next made a halt at Greensburg, in Westmoreland County, and the next halt that we made was not far from the 'Bullcock Plains,' known by many as Braddock's Fields. When we arrived at Braddock's Fields we formed our camp and laid there a few days. Whilst there, the soldiers, many of them, amused themselves by climbing up into the trees for the purpose of cutting out leaden bullets which had been lodged there in 1755 when Gen. Braddock was defeated by the Indians in the campaign of that year. From Braddock's Fields we moved on to Fort Pitt (now Pittsburgh), and encamped within a mile of the town.

"Whilst we laid at Fort Pitt I obtained permission to visit the town every day or two. The old fort (Duquesne) which had been built for the protection of this post, I do not recollect whether it was occupied by any of our troops, but believe it was not. It was so built as to command the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers above and at their junction, as also the Ohio River below. The hills around Pittsburgh, particularly those on the opposite sides of both rivers, were very high. The hills above Pittsburgh and between the two rivers were (some of them) quite high, and were called different names, as Grant's Hill, Scotch Hill, Forbes' Fields, &c.

"Instead of being met, as was threatened, by a formidable foe, we saw nothing in the form of enemies. The disaffected had disbanded and gone quietly to their homes. The insurrectionary spirit was every day growing weaker and weaker, and in proportion as this had manifested itself the insurgent force had diminished. Mustering from seven to ten thousand men only, and they promiscuously and hastily drawn from their homes, young and old, without proper leaders, proper discipline, military stores, etc., they had thought it altogether futile to attempt to resist (or cope with) a well-disciplined army of upwards of fifteen thousand strong. After a number of the more active leaders were captured and handed over to the proper authorities, to be dealt with according to the laws of the land, the expedition was considered at an end. Governor Lee, believing that it was altogether necessary and loudly called for, left Gen. Morgan with a strong detachment in the centre of this disaffected country. The main body of the army was then withdrawn from Pittsburgh and the surrounding country, and were marched on their way homeward. Many who sought discharges obtained them; some of these enlisted in the United States regular service and marched on to join Gen. Wayne, who was then engaged in a war with the Indians on the Miami, in Ohio.

"After climbing and descending alternately for a number of days together the different mountains which laid between Greensburg and the Cumberland Valley, I at length arrived at Strasburg. Setting out from Strasburg, in Franklin County, it was not long until I reached Harrisburg. A number of days elapsed before Capt. Fisher's (the Dentezel's) company arrived at Harrisburg."

In 1805, Joseph Scott published "A Geographical Description of Pennsylvania; also the counties respectively in the order in which they were established by the Legislature, with an alphabetical list of the townships in each county, and their population in 1805." The account of Dauphin at this period is worth reproducing in this connection, as it contains facts nowhere else found:

"DAUPHIN COUNTY.—A mountainous county, established, by the legislature, the 4th of March, 1785. It was taken from Lancaster county. Dauphin is bounded N. by Mahantago creek, which separates it from Northumberland, N. E. by Berks, S. E. by Lancaster, W. and S. W. by the Susquehanna, which divides it from Mifflin, on the N. W.; by Cumberland on the W.; and York on the S. W. It is 45 miles in length, and 26 in breadth. The principal waters are Swatara, and its numerous branches, Paxtang, Fishing, Stoey, Clark's, Powell's, Armstrong's, and Wikiolesky creeks, also Manady and Beaver creeks, both important streams, and flowing into the Swatara from the east side of the county, besides Mahantago, which is the N. boundary of the county, and Conewago, which is its S. boundary; all of which flow westerly, and fall into the Susquehanna. The principal mountains, beginning N. are Mahantago, Wikiolesky, Peters' Little, Second, and the Blue Mountain; besides the Conewago hills, partly in this, and Lancaster county. The lands south of the Blue mountain, including about one-half of the county, are considerably fertile, and not inferior to the lands generally in Lancaster county. The valleys between the mountains are very narrow, except Luke's valley S. of Mahantago mountain, and a large triangular valley, on each side of Armstrong's creek, between Wikiolesky mountain on the N. and Peters' on the S. Abundance of iron ore is found in some of the mountains. Two fornares and 2 forges have been erected: they manufacture pig, bar-iron, hollow-ware, &c. This county contained in 1805, 72 grist-mills, 17 saw-mills, 6 oil-mills, 4 fulling-mills, 2 hemp-mills, 1 paper-mill, 127 distilleries, a boring and a powder-mill. Dauphin contained, in 1790, 17,965 free inhabitants, and 212 slaves; and in 1800, 22,177 free inhabitants, and 193 slaves. It sends 3 representatives to the general assembly; and, in 1805, gave, on the election of governor, 3,151 votes.

"Harrisburg, a borough, and post town, in which the courts of Justice are held for the county. It is agreeably situated on the E. side of the Susquehanna, in a large fertile valley, between the Conewago hills on the S. and the Blue mountain on the N. It was regularly laid out in 1785, and consists of 4 streets, which extend parallel to the river, as Front, Second, &c., intersected by 6 others at right angles, called Mulberry, Chestnut, Market, Walnut, Locust, and Pine streets, with an alley 20 feet wide, extending both ways, through the middle of each square, parallel to the streets. Market and Second street, are each 90 feet wide; and all the others 52½ feet. At the intersection of Market and Second street is an oblong square, 520 feet long, by 150 broad, in which are two brick market-houses. The town is built upon ground about 60 feet above the level of the river. The rising ground from the river to Front street, several hundred feet in breadth, belongs to the public. It can only be built upon one side. The river, up and down, with Macley's island in front, presents to the eye, a beautiful view from this point. It serves for piling the large quantities of lumber, which is annually brought in rafts down the river. The trade in lumber contributed largely to the rapid improvement, which continued for 6 years, when a mill-dam was erected in the neighborhood. The place soon became extremely sickly, which obliged the inhabitants to purchase the mill, and clear out the dam, which has restored its ancient salubrity; and it is now improving with its former rapidity. Harrisburg contains about 400 houses; about one-third are of brick. The public buildings are an elegant brick court-house, 91 feet in front, including the offices, and 50 feet deep; with an elegant cupola, a large hall, and town clock. The offices at each end, which contain the records of the county, and the public library, are fire-proof. A stone jail, two stories high, with a spacious yard surrounded by a stone wall, 18 feet in height; a brick and a log meeting house. An elevated piece of ground, consisting about 4 acres, which commands a beautiful view of the town and neighborhood, is reserved for the accommodation of the general assembly, in case they fix on that as their permanent seat of government. In several parts of the town are wells of excellent water. The inhabitants may also be supplied from several streams, that issue from the heights, behind the town, and which may be conveyed, at a small expense, through every street, except the lot appropriated for the use of the legislature.

⁸ Lebanon was incorporated the 28th of March, 1799. It is 25 miles E. by N. of Harrisburg, 82 N. W. by W. of Philadelphia, and 167 from Washington city.

W. branch of Swatara, about 2 miles above its confluence with the Susquehanna.² The inhabitants carry on a brisk trade, in wheat and flour, by means of the Susquehanna, and its E. and N. W. branches. Contiguous to the town is one of the largest merchant-mills in the United States. Middletown is 15 miles S. E. of Harrisburg, 92 W. by N. of Philadelphia, and 142 from Washington city.

CHAPTER XX.

The War of 1812—General Officers—Rolls of the Companies of Captains Carothers, Crain, Dietrick, Elder, Fetterhoff, Graham, Henry, Knight, McElhenny, Moorhead, Smith, Todd—Peace—Association of the Soldiers of the War of 1812.

We shall not here refer in full to the causes which led to the second war with England, that of 1812-14, save to say that the difficulties arose from the deprivations of the latter power in assuming the right to search American vessels, and against which the United States had earnestly protested. On the 18th of June, 1812, Congress declared war against England, voted five millions of dollars for war purposes, and authorized a call for one hundred thousand troops. In the history of Lebanon County we have given in full the address of Governor Snyder, of Pennsylvania, calling upon the volunteer soldiery of the State "to rally around the constituted authorities of the Union." Such was the enthusiasm of the hour that in response to the Governor's call three times as many troops tendered their services as were required. The disappointment of some was so great that money was freely offered to secure a place among those accepted by the authorities.

Dauphin County was not backward. In 1812 and 1813 none of the companies which offered themselves were called, but certain ones were held in readiness for any emergency which might arise.

When the news of the battle of Bladensburg and the capture of Washington City reached the capital, the old-time patriotism was aroused, and responsive to the call of the hour the following companies were mustered into service, and hastened to the front and to the relief of the beleaguered city of Baltimore. Some of the companies never marched farther than York.

loons white. Blue pantaloons may be worn in the winter. Vest, single-breasted, without pocket-flaps.

"Epaulettes, sword mounting, buttons, spurs, buckles, and trimmings of the Artillery, gold or gilt; those of the Infantry, silver or plated. The sword to be of the sabre form.

"Black stock, of leather or silk; cockade blue and red, of leather or silk. It is recommended that the cockade be always worn on duty, or in service, or when in requisition. Volunteer corps may select their own uniform, but the cockade of the State cannot be dispensed with. It is earnestly recommended to the officers of the militia to use their best exertions in their several commands to induce the non-commissioned officers to wear worsted epaulettes. That the expense may not be an obstacle, it is ordered that their uniform be a gray coat and pantaloons of the same color. In summer, hunting shirts and trousers may be worn. A round black hat, the rim not to exceed three inches. Any particulars not above prescribed may be supplied by reference to the regulations prescribed for the army of the United States.

"As a due proportion of military pride and uniformity of dress is important to form the character of a soldier, it is expected that every man who may be called upon to defend his home, his country, and his rights, will exert himself promptly to carry these orders into complete effect. It is judged proper to embrace this occasion to recommend to officers and men to procure all the materials for clothing and equipments of American manufacture."

On the 24th of December, 1814, a treaty of peace was signed by the American and British commissioners. The news did not reach America until the 11th of February. On the 14th, The Oracle of Dauphin issued the following announcement:

Oracle Extra.

Tuesday, February 14, 1815.

PEACE WITH ENGLAND.

The Editor of the Oracle hastens to gratify his Customers with the following heart-cheering News:

Office of the New York Gazette,
Saturday Evening 11th Feb. 9 o'clock.

It has pleased the Almighty to restore to us the blessings of PEACE. Participating in the deep and general Joy on this great and interesting occasion, we can only state the fact, that

We have just seen HENRY CARROLL, Esq. Secretary to the American Legation. He informs us, that he has arrived in the British Sloop of War Favorite, with the TREATY OF PEACE, signed by the American and British Commissioners, on the 24th of December; and that he is to depart for Washington in the morning. The vessel is below and will be up to-morrow.

The foregoing highly important and heart-cheering news, was received yesterday by Robert Adams, Esq. of this city, by an express from New-York.—Mr. Adams politely favored us with a copy which was immediately issued from this office in a "Freeman's Journal Extraordinary."

We congratulate our readers on this most auspicious event, and fervently pray that Divine Providence may continue to our country, for ages to come, the inestimable blessing of PEACE with all nations of the earth.

On the 17th of February the treaty was approved by the Senate of the United States.

ASSOCIATION OF THE SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Death and removal rapidly decimating the ranks of the "Old Defenders," the surviving members met on the 4th of July, 1856, and agreed to form themselves into an association. The following Constitution was prepared and signed, and as death removed one of their number the date of the decease was added thereto. In connection with the record of those who served in the war of 1812 in the minute-book kept by the secretary, David Harris, Esq., are certain facts which are worth preserving:

CONSTITUTION.

"For the purpose of preserving old recollections, and of cherishing those kindly feelings of fellowship which should always exist among those who in times past were lauded together in defence of their common country, WE, SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812, residing in Dauphin County and vicinity, whose names are herewith subscribed, do agree to form ourselves into an Association, and to be governed by the following Constitution.

"1. The Association shall be known by the name of 'The Association of Soldiers of the War of 1812, residing in Dauphin County and its vicinity.'

"2. The officers of the Association shall consist of a President, two Vice-Presidents, a Treasurer, a Secretary, and a Marshal.

"3. It shall be the duty of the President, or in his absence of either of the Vice-Presidents, to preside at all meetings of the Association, and to call all extra meetings at such times and places as he, or either of them in his absence, shall designate.

"4. The Treasurer shall take charge of and account for all funds which may be raised by the voluntary contributions of the members.

"5. The Secretary shall keep a fair record of all proceedings of the Association, and insert in his minutes the names of all the members who participate in the annual celebration of the Fourth of July, as well as the names of those who may die during their membership, so far as he can ascertain the same.

"6. The Marshal shall form and command the Association at all public parades.

"7. There shall be an annual parade of the Association on the Fourth of July, on which occasion the members will march from the parade-ground to the place previously designated for celebrating the day by a dinner or otherwise, the expense of which shall be borne by the members participating therein in equal proportions.

"8. Any soldier of the war of 1812 who does not subscribe to this Constitution before the first meeting of the Association may be permitted to become a member upon application to the president and secretary.

"9. It shall be competent for the Association to adopt at any time such rules and regulations for its proceedings as a majority of the members present may deem expedient.

"10. All political or religious sectarian questions or conversations are strictly prohibited at all meetings of the Association.

The first chairman was Dr. John Heisely, and the secretary David Harris. From its organization until the last meeting of the association the following memoranda must suffice:

July 4, 1857.—There were present twenty-nine members. Joseph Wallace was chosen president, David Harris secretary, with other officers. The day was celebrated on Forster's Island, the Declaration of Independence read by John C. Kuokel, and an oration delivered by Samuel A. Holman, and after dinner, prepared by Curry Taylor, the usual patriotic toasts were offered. The music—the drum and fife—was furnished by Samuel Holman, Sr., Jacob Dubbs, and David J. Krause.

February 22, 1858.—The drum belonging to Jacob Dubbs was presented to the association. At this meeting the following address to the Congress of the United States and resolutions were reported by the committee, consisting of Thomas L. Wilson, John Maglauchlin, John Heisely, Charles Carson, and Jacob Fiesler, and unanimously adopted:

"The soldiers of the war of 1812, here assembled, respectfully request the Congress of the United States to pass the bill now before it, with the amendment hereafter suggested, for the relief of those who periled their lives in the defense of their country during the second contest for its national independence. In making this request, they are not seeking for the introduction of any new system of pensions into the practice of the government. That system was very justly, although tardily, incorporated into the various acts rewarding those venerated men whose sacrifices and services in the field brought the war of the Revolution to a triumphant conclusion. The value of the self-sacrificing services of these defenders, who have passed from the stage of action, is attested by the unexampled progress and prosperity of our common country; and there can be no man now living so insensible to every patriotic feeling of national gratitude as to desire that one line of the record bestowing some evidence of that gratitude should be blotted out. We, in common with the remnant of the band of defenders of the war of 1812, stand now in the same position before the assembled representatives of a free people, whose civil and religious rights we aided in preserving, as our fathers of the Revolution did in past years.

"Nearly forty-six years had elapsed since the nation called upon her sons to enroll themselves in her defense against the arrogant pretensions and unjustifiable encroachments upon her public honor made by a foreign power. In the prime of life, and at a period of manhood when a natural prudence dictates a strict attention to those pursuits to which all men look as the means of sustenance and comfort in their declining years, the soldiers of 1812, abandoning all such selfish considerations, and animated solely by that spirit of patriotism which it is to be hoped may never be extinguished in the bosom of a single citizen of the Republic, promptly and on all occasions obeyed the call thus made upon them. No mercenary motive was mingled with this cheerful performance of a duty which, it is freely admitted, is imposed upon every citizen of a free government when the existence of that government is threatened by foreign aggression or internal violence. A very large proportion of the men who rendered service in the war of 1812 have crossed that narrow stream which divides Time from Eternity. Their surviving comrades, comparatively few in number, are now naturally standing on the brink of that stream. A number of them have already passed the threescore years and ten allotted to man's pilgrimage upon earth; and the time that has elapsed since their services were performed proves that their junior comrades have nearly reached that point of mortal existence.

"It is respectfully submitted to Congress whether these sacrifices and these services, rendered in a period of extreme danger to the perpetuity of our national institutions, are not deserving of some substantial evidence of the gratitude of the country? It was justly extended to the soldiers of the Revolution: why withhold it from those who formed the bulwark of that country's defense in the second war for independence? One nobly secured the liberties of the people, the other preserved them from foreign violation.

"Whilst the government has made large donations from the public treasury for improving the condition of the rising generation, and has now large projects before it for the same purpose, in the shape of grants of public lands, the objection cannot now be raised that the state of the public funds justifies that government in withholding an act of justice from those who, in years gone by, made serious sacrifices in its defense. Any attempt at argument on this point would be an impeachment of the intelligence of the national legislature.

"Such being the views entertained by the meeting, be it, therefore,

Resolved, That Congress are respectfully urged to pass such a bill for the relief of the soldiers of 1812 as will render equal justice to all who served in that war.

Resolved, That in the bill before Congress, if it should become a law, many of our old companions in arms will receive but half pay.

Resolved, That we regard that portion of the bill as unjust and unequal. A large number of our associates left their homes and marched to the points of attack or defense for an indefinite period, subject to such time as the government might require their services, but being discharged prior to the expiration of six months, the bill places them upon half pay.

Resolved, That we trust that the pending bill will pass with such an amendment as to make no distinction in the time of service, but that all who marched to the defense of their country in that war will be allowed full pay.

Resolved, That the advanced age of these soldiers renders it imperative that any measure for their relief should be passed without delay.

Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting are tendered to those members of the past and present Congress who have exerted themselves to render justice to us and to our comrades in arms.

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth, with the request that they will lay them before their respective bodies.

"JOSEPH WALLACE, President.

"DAVID HARRIS, Secretary."

July 5, 1858.—The annual celebration was held on Forster's Island, at which there were present twenty-six soldiers of the war of 1812. John Maglaughlin was chosen president, William Allison and George J. Heisey vice-presidents, and other officers. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Association be perpetuated by the members present nominating who shall succeed them, and who, upon signing the constitution, shall become members."

Agreeable therewith the following nominations were made:

July 4, 1859.—The association, twenty-seven in number, went to Mechanicsburg as the invited guests of the "National Bines," of that place. They were met at the depot by the Bines, a military company from Churchtown, the Washington Engine Company, and a committee of citizens, escorted to their quarters, and subsequently to Coover's Grove, where the day was properly celebrated. July 4, 1862.—The day was celebrated on Independence Island, twenty being present. Charles Carson was chosen president. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we, a few of the remaining soldiers of the war of 1812, most cordially approve of the course pursued by his Excellency Andrew G. Curtin, Governor of Pennsylvania, in reference to the present war for the suppression of the wicked rebellion now raging against the government, and especially of his increasing care for the sick and wounded of the soldiers from Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of the association be appointed to prepare a memorial to the President of the United States that he may recommend to Congress the passage of a law granting pensions to the few surviving soldiers and the widows of soldiers of the war of 1812.

Resolved, That some person be appointed to solicit the signatures of the soldiers of the war of 1812 in Dauphin and adjoining counties to offer their services to the President of the United States to defend any particular point, believing that they could fight and not run away, and that they still believe they are able to defend their country in her time of need."

May 16, 1863.—Twenty members of the association attended the reception of the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

June 25, 1863.—In consequence of the rebel raid into our State the association resolved to form themselves into a military company for the protection of the city, and offer their services to the Governor. The following officers were elected:

Captain.—Charles Carson.

First Lieutenant.—Andrew Krause.

Second Lieutenant.—George Prince.

First Sergeant.—David Harris.

July 4, 1863.—The association met after parade and elected Samuel Holman president, with the other officers.

July 25, 1863.—The "Old Home Guards" met at the court-house this morning. The company was formed and marched to the capitol, where, after a complimentary address by Governor Curtin, was mustered out of service, and delivered their arms and accoutrements to the State authorities.

January 19, 1864.—By invitation the association participated in the ceremonies attending the inauguration of Governor Curtin, thirteen members being present.

June 6, 1864.—By invitation the association joined in the reception of the Pennsylvania Reserves.

July 4, 1864.—The day was celebrated by a dinner on Independence Island, fifteen members present. The Declaration was read by John B. Cay. Dr. John Heisely was chosen president, and the deaths during the year announced of Messrs. Himmelright, Holman, Shell, Ayres, and Brady.

July 4, 1865.—The association met, seven members only present, and after the election of James R. Boyd, president, with the other officers, adjourned. This was the last general meeting, save to attend the funeral of their comrades, who one by one passed from off the stage of life.

CHAPTER XXI.

The Backshot War—The Causes which Led to It—The Proclamation of the Governor—The Call to Arms—Proceedings in the Legislature.

AT the October election, 1838, David R. Porter, of Huntingdon County, the Democratic candidate, was chosen Governor of the State, after a hotly-contested political canvass, over Governor Joseph Ritner, the candidate of the Whigs and Anti-Masons, the majority for Porter being five thousand five hundred and four votes. Immediately upon the result of the election being made known, on the 15th of October, Thomas H. Burrows, Secretary of the Commonwealth and chairman of the Anti-Masonic State Committee, issued a private circular "To the friends of Governor Ritner," calling upon them to demand an investigation of the alleged frauds committed at the polls, and advising them to "treat the election held on the 9th of October as if it had never taken place." This circular had the desired effect, and the defeated Anti-Masonic and Whig candidates for the Legislature in different parts of the State contested the seats of their successful Democratic competitors upon the slightest pretext.

The election took place on the 9th of October, the Legislature met on the 4th of December, and the new Governor was not to be inaugurated until the 15th of January following, it being the first inauguration under the then new Constitution. As trouble was anticipated upon the assembling of the Legislature, a large number of excited people, especially from the districts in which contests were pending, flocked to Harrisburg to witness the result of the struggle. The House of Representatives then consisted of one hundred members. Of these, eight were from Philadelphia, whose seats were contested; and of the remaining members, forty-eight were Democrats and forty-four Whigs and Anti-Masons. The majority of the Senate belonged to the latter party, and consequently promptly organized by the election of Charles B. Penrose as Speaker. The House met with all the contesting delegates present. The clerk read the names of those members which had been handed to him by the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Upon reaching the returns of Philadelphia County it was discovered that the legal returns had been withheld, and fraudulent ones, signed by only six of the seventeen return judges, substituted. This had been anticipated and provided against by the Democrats, who produced and had read the true returns, duly certified by the prothonotary of Philadelphia. The reading of these returns and the seating of the two sets of contesting delegates from Philadelphia County caused the greatest excitement in the House, during which Thaddeus Stevens, then a member of the Legislature from Adams County, moved that that body proceed to the election of a Speaker. The clerk then called the roll of Whig and Anti-Masonic members, and declared Thomas S. Cunningham, of Beaver County, elected Speaker. He was conducted to the Speaker's chair and took his seat. The Democrats paid very little attention to the movements of the opposition, and elected William Hopkins, of Washington County, as Speaker. Two members escorted Mr. Hopkins to the Speaker's platform, where Cunningham had been already seated. It is said Col. Thomas B. McElwee, of Bedford County, one of Hopkins' escorts, ordered Cunningham, in a peremptory manner, to surrender the Speaker's chair to Hopkins, and he obeyed, taking another that stood near by on the platform. The Pennsylvania House of Representatives thus enjoyed a double-headed organization. The members of the House of each party were then sworn in by their respective officers. After qualifying all their members and electing officers, and appointing a committee to wait upon the Governor, and one to wait upon the Senate to inform them that the House was ready to proceed to business, both parties adjourned their respective bodies to meet the next day at ten o'clock. But the Cunningham party did not wait until the time appointed. In the afternoon they met again in the hall, and after their Speaker had called them to order, he requested Mr. Spackman, of Philadelphia, to act as Speaker pro tem. Some Philadelphians being in the lobby of the hall as spectators, and feeling very indignant at the proceedings of the Cunningham body, then went up to the platform and carried pro tem. Speaker Spackman off and set him down in the aisle. This interference from outsiders the Cunningham House had not the power to resent, and it immediately adjourned in confusion. It afterwards met in Matthew Wilson's hotel, now known as the Lochiel House.

During these exciting scenes inside the State-House large crowds of people gathered outside the capitol who were more or less boisterous. Determined and desperate men were there on both sides, threats were made, defiance hurled back and forth, and to the timid the aspect of affairs appeared alarming. On the night of the first day of the session a large public meeting was held in the court-house, over which Thomas Craig Miller, of Adams County, presided, with a number of vice-presidents. The meeting was addressed by Col. J. J. McCahan, E. A. Penniman, of Philadelphia, and George W. Barton, of Lancaster. A committee on resolutions was appointed, who reported the following, which were adopted:

"Resolved, That we recommend to the citizens generally to pursue a prudent and a calm course, awaiting the events of the day with that firmness which freemen in a free country have resolved upon.

"Resolved, That neither those in power, who endeavor to perpetuate their reign through unlawful and fraudulent returns, or citizen-soldiers, who have the same feelings and interest with us, will intimidate people resolved upon having their rights."

A committee was also appointed by the meeting to wait on Thomas H. Burrows, Secretary of the Commonwealth, and request of him forthwith to furnish the clerks of the Senate and House of Representatives the full legal returns of the election. A Committee of Safety, consisting of fifteen persons, was also appointed. About the time of the assembling of the meeting, Governor Ritner, acting under the advice of his political advisers, Messrs. Stevens, Burrows, and Peurose, issued the following proclamation:

"Pennsylvania, ss.

"A PROCLAMATION.

"WHEREAS, A lawless, infuriated, armed mob from the counties of Philadelphia, Lancaster, Adams, and other places have assembled at the seat of government, with the avowed object of disturbing, interrupting, and overawing the Legislature of this Commonwealth, and of preventing its proper organization, and the peaceable and free discharge of its duties;

"And whereas, The said mob have already, on this day, entered the Senate Chamber, and in an outrageous and violent manner, by clanking, shouting, and threatening violence and death to some of the members of that body and other officers of the government, and, finally, by rushing within the bar of the Senate Chamber, in defiance of every effort to restrain them, compelled the Senate to suspend business;

"And whereas, They still remain here in force, encouraged by a person who is an officer of the General Government from Philadelphia, and are setting the law at open defiance, and rendering it unsafe for the Legislative bodies to assemble in the Capitol;

"THEREFORE, This is to call upon the civil authority to exert themselves to restore order to the utmost of their power, and upon the militia force of the Commonwealth to hold themselves in instant readiness to repair to the seat of government, and upon all good citizens to aid in curbing this lawless mob, and in reestablishing the supremacy of the law.

"Given under my hand and the Great Seal of the State, at Harrisburg, this fourth day of December, in the year of our Lord one [L. S.] thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, and of the Commonwealth the sixty-third.

"By the Governor:

"THOMAS H. BURROWS,
"Secretary of the Commonwealth."

The State arsenal was taken possession of by a force in the interest of Governor Ritner, and large quantities of powder, cartridges, and other ammunition taken there. Ritner's proclamation and call for troops and the seizure of the arsenal, filled the citizens of Harrisburg and the people who had assembled here with intense alarm. There had been no actual outbreak, but the situation now began to assume a grave aspect, and large numbers of people flocked into the city, attracted by curiosity, to participate in the impending struggle. As an offset to the Governor's proclamation, the sheriff of Dauphin County deemed it his duty to issue a counter proclamation, in which he stated that at no time had there been any riotous proceedings upon the part of the people, nor any disturbance which rendered necessary his interposition as a civil officer to preserve the peace.

The excitement among the people continued to grow, and a large crowd flocked to the arsenal, determined to prevent the arms and ammunition there stored from being seized by the Governor and his party for the purpose of subduing them. These excited people would probably have captured the arsenal if Maj. George Ford, of Lancaster, and Joseph Henderson, a committee appointed by the State authorities, had not appeared at this juncture before the Committee of Safety and made the following pledge for themselves and for those who sent them:

"That, as men of honor, no ordnance, arms, muskets, or ammunition should, by any order of the Governor, or any other authority whatever, be taken from the arsenal for the purpose of arming any forces that might collect in obedience to the proclamation of the Governor; and that if any use of them should so be made, they would hold themselves personally responsible for the consequences."

This pledge was satisfactory to the Committee of Safety, who believed that the only object of the people in making a demonstration upon the arsenal was, not to employ the public arms themselves, but, if possible, to prevent their adversaries from making use of them.

At this time a large multitude had collected around the arsenal, having been attracted thither by the intelligence that a quantity of ammunition had been taken there, and that their adversaries had stationed in the building a body of armed men as a rendezvous to subdue the people. The excitement had become tremendous, and for the purpose of acting in good faith on the part of the committee, on motion of L. Kidder, it was

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to go and address the people, make known the pledge of Messrs. Ford and Henderson, and urge them quietly to disperse."

Whereupon L. Kidder, Gen. Adam Diller, and Lewis S. Coryell were appointed the said committee, who immediately retired to discharge their duties.

Afterward the above-mentioned committee, by L. Kidder, reported that they had successfully discharged the duties assigned to them, and that they had severally addressed the people, who manifested every disposition to preserve the peace and to act on the defensive, and that the multitude had already quietly dispersed. The report was adopted.

On the 5th of December the Governor made a special requisition on Maj.-Gen. Robert Patterson, commanding the First Division Pennsylvania Militia, for a force of troops sufficient to quell the "insurrection," and march them immediately to the seat of government. Upon receiving orders, and before leaving Philadelphia, Gen. Patterson obtained from the United States Arsenal at Frankford a supply of ammunition, of which the following is an official inventory:

"Twelve thousand four hundred and eighty musket-ball and buckshot cartridges, 600 pistol cartridges, 400 priming tubes, 68 6-pounder strapped shot, fixed; 132 6-pounder cannon-balls, 200 musket-flints, 100 pistol-flints, 20 pounds slow-match.

"GEORGE D. RAMSEY,
"Capt. of Ord.

"FRANKFORD ARSENAL, Dec. 7, 1838."

The regulation ammunition for the infantry then was buckshot cartridges, which consisted of twelve buckshot, each as good as a bullet. The headquarters of the Whig party during these troubles was the Shakespeare Hotel, on Locust Street, where Shakespeare Hall now stands. A report was circulated upon the streets that a number of men at this hotel were engaged in making buckshot cartridges to be used on the "mob." A watch was set to prevent these cartridges from being taken to the arsenal, and this watch intercepted a negro who had been employed to deliver them. He was compelled to surrender the cartridges, which were distributed among those present, and some are yet preserved as mementoes of the "Buckshot war." From these incidents the name "Buckshot war" is derived.

About one hundred of the troops arrived on Saturday night (December 8th) following, and obtained quarters in the court-house; and at four o'clock P.M. the next day the main body, numbering about eight hundred, under the command of Maj.-Gen. Patterson and staff, arrived below town, and halted until communication could be had with the State authorities, which was effected in about an hour, when the troops entered the town, and, after marching through several of the streets, proceeded to the public ground in front of the State Arsenal, where they were divided off into detachments, who severally obtained quarters in the arsenal, the Exchange, where the United States post-office is now erected, the court-house, the Lancasterian school-house on Walnut Street, and the Presbyterian Church, on Second below Chestnut Streets.

The Governor did not stop with the ordering of

Gen. Patterson's command to the seat of government, but on the 5th of December addressed a letter to Capt. E. V. Sumner, U.S.A., then in command of Carlisle Barracks, with a small body of United States dragoons, requesting him to march his troops to Harrisburg for the protection of the State authorities. To this appeal, and one made to him by Charles B. Penrose, Capt. Sumner replied that he did not deem it proper to interfere in the troubles then existing at Harrisburg, which appeared to him to proceed from political differences alone. On Friday, December 7th, Governor Ritner wrote to President Van Buren, laying before him a full account of the affair, and requested the President to take such measures as would protect the State against violence. In this communication the Governor stated that he had the day before made a formal application to Capt. E. V. Sumner for aid, inclosing a copy of his formal request, together with a copy of Sumner's reply. He also inclosed a copy of the proclamation he had issued, and a published statement of the facts connected with the riot in the Senate Chamber, signed by a majority of the Senators, and sworn to by the Speaker and other members of the Senate. He also deemed it proper to state to the President that the most active leaders of the "mob" were J. J. McCahan, of the Philadelphia post-office; Charles F. Muench, a deputy marshal of the Middle District of Pennsylvania; and E. A. Penniman, said to be an officer of the custom-house of Philadelphia. The President replied to this communication through Joel R. Poinsett, Secretary of War, declining to interpose until it appeared certain that convening the Legislature was impracticable.

The Governor's party, finding that Gen. Patterson refused to install them in power, and would obey only such orders as he regarded proper after the orders had been given him by the Governor, made a requisition on Samuel Alexander, major-general of the Eleventh Division of the State militia, a citizen of Carlisle, and an ultra Whig in politics. There were at this time three volunteer companies at Carlisle, mustering in all about ninety men, but only sixty-seven participated in the Buckshot war. The Carlisle infantry was officered as follows: William S. Ramsey, captain; Robert McCartney, first lieutenant; George L. Murray, second lieutenant; and Alexander S. Lyne, orderly sergeant. Carlisle Light Artillery: Capt., E. M. Biddle; First Lieut., William Porter; Second Lieut., Robert A. Noble. Washington Artillery, formerly the Marion Riflemen: Capt., William Crop; First Lieut., Alfred Creigh; Orderly Sergt., Thomas B. Thompson. The battalion was in command of Col. Willis Foulk, an ardent Democrat, who was ignored by Gen. Alexander. The troops received orders on December 15th to march to Harrisburg, and on the following morning embarked for the seat of war. On reaching the western side of the river they disembarked and marched across the wagon-bridge, breaking step to keep from jarring the structure. Gen. Patterson and his command had already taken their departure for Philadelphia when the troops from Carlisle reached Harrisburg. They marched into the city market, and thence to the arsenal, where they were quartered for a week. There was no actual necessity for any troops at any time during the continuance of the dead-lock of the Legislature, for no disturbances occurred or were threatened that the civil authorities could not have quelled. The appearance of armed troops, however, upon the streets, and close to the halls of legislation, only added to the excitement. It was estimated that there were in the borough at this time "between thirty and fifty thousand strangers." When the Carlisle troops arrived the contest was approaching its end, and the soldiers regarded their trip as a frolic, and enjoyed themselves.

On the 17th of December, Messrs. Butler and Sturdevant, of Luzerne County, and Montelius, of Union, three legally Whig members, abandoned their associates and were sworn in as members of the Hopkins House, which gave it a legal quorum over and above the eight Democratic members from Philadelphia, whose right to seats the "Rump House," as it was contemptuously called, disputed. Finally, on Tuesday evening, December 25th, a majority of the Senate, finding that it was impossible to accomplish the designs of the revolutionists, by a vote of seventeen to sixteen, agreed that a committee should be appointed to inform the Hopkins House that the Senate was organized and ready to co-operate with it, which ended the difficulty.

In the Senate the troubles were of a more complicated character. There were contests for seats in this body from several senatorial districts. Upon the floor were members of the House, among them Thaddeus Stevens, of Adams, the leader of the "Stevens Rump House," and the Secretary of the Commonwealth, Thomas H. Burrowes, of Lancaster, who had gone there with the minority returns. In the lobbies at the rear of the Senate chamber was a dense crowd of spectators, composed of excited and enraged citizens, some of whom were there out of curiosity and others with the determination of preventing the seating of Hanna and Wagner, the illegally-returned senators from Philadelphia, either by the form prescribed by law or by intimidation. The spectators were noisy and demonstrative, and the sight of Stevens, Penrose, of Cumberland County, and Burrowes exerting themselves to exclude senators legally entitled to their seats aroused the lookers-on to such an extent that threats of personal violence were indulged in. At last Speaker Penrose, unable to stem the current any longer, abandoned his post, and with Stevens and Burrowes escaped from a window in the rear of the Senate chamber, and under shelter of the night from the State-House inclosure. A paper published at Harrisburg at this time states that "Mr. Penrose, the Federal Speaker of the Senate, in effecting his retreat from the Senate chamber on the first day of the session, jumped out of a window twelve feet high, through three thorn-bushes, and over a seven-foot picket-fence."

In the midst of the excitement and turbulence it was impossible for the Senate to proceed with business, and after the Speaker abandoned his post, that body adjourned to meet the next day. When the hour arrived no quorum was present,—the Whig members being absent by agreement,—and of course the Senate was adjourned until the following day, and so on day after day until December 17th, when, as before stated, Messrs. Butler, Sturdevant, and Montelius left the Cunningham or Ritner branch of the House, and were sworn in as members of the Democratic House under Speaker Hopkins. This gave to the latter body a quorum of fifty-one members whose seats were not disputed, so that no legal obstacle could longer prevent the Senate from recognizing it as the legitimate House. Accordingly, on the 27th of December, in the Senate, Mr. Michler, of Northampton, submitted the following preamble and resolution, which, after various fruitless attempts to amend, were adopted by a vote of seventeen yeas and sixteen nays:

"WHEREAS, Difficulties have arisen in the organization of the House of Representatives, and two bodies have for some time been in existence, each claiming to be the regularly constituted House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, but neither having had a constitutional quorum of members whose seats were regularly returned, and neither has yet been fully recognized by the Senate;

"And whereas, The House organized by the election of Mr. Hopkins as Speaker is now composed of a constitutional quorum of regularly returned members and being thus brought within the pale of the Constitution, the Senate ought no longer to refuse to recognize the said House as the proper constituted House of Representatives of Pennsylvania; therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inform said House that the Senate is now organized and ready to proceed to business."

The committee so appointed immediately waited upon the House, and a joint committee was appointed by both branches to inform the Governor that the Legislature was organized.

At the meeting of the House on the morning of the 27th, Mr. Cunningham, with some twenty of the members of his division, were present and duly qualified. Mr. Hopkins, the Speaker, then resigned, but was immediately re-elected. Gen. Patterson's command evacuated the borough on Sunday, the 16th of December, and the battalion from Cumberland County on the 23d following, and thus ended the "Buckshot war," one of the most exciting political events in the history of Pennsylvania.¹

"At the time of the Buckshot war I was in command of the troops that marched from the city to restore order and quell the riot. The difficulty arose from a few of the leaders of the party then in power trying to treat the election as a nullity and to retain possession of the government for three years longer. Governor Ritner, a perfectly honest and well-meaning man, was persuaded to co-operate in the matter. The

CHAPTER XXII.

The War with Mexico—Organization of the Cameron Guards—Their Services in Mexico—Who raised the first American Flag in the Citadel of the City of Mexico—Roll of the Cameron Guards.

It is not necessary in this connection to state the causes which led to the war between Mexico and the United States. Suffice it to narrate that during the friends of David R. Porter, who had received a decided majority of the votes, the Democratic candidate, were determined not to submit, and assembled in Harrisburg in immense numbers. They were led and commanded by about twenty-five officers of the old regular army of the war of 1812. The mob, if I may use the word, surrounded the capitol and entered the Senate Chamber and took possession, the Speaker and some of the senators jumping out of a back window to save themselves from the fury of the rioters. Whereupon an order was sent to me by the Governor of the State to proceed with my division of fifteen hundred men to Harrisburg. I, of course, wished to go prepared for emergencies, and obtained from the United States arsenal at Frankford a full supply of ammunition, for the infantry mainly buckshot cartridges, which consisted of a cartridge with twelve buckshot, each as good as a bullet. I did this certainly not from any desire to kill many of those then in possession of the Senate Chamber, many of whom were personal friends and old associates in the army. Instead, I was prompted by a desire to save my own people, in the event of a conflict at close quarters, by rapidly laying over a few and dispersing the remainder. I had good reason for this, as my command consisted in the main of the flower of Philadelphia, the best young men in it in fact. The exceeding good conduct of the officers and men of that command prevented a conflict between the troops and the mob. If blood had been shed the whole State would have been involved in a civil war. On my arrival at Harrisburg I, with my staff, reported to the Governor at his residence. Such was the panic at that time in Harrisburg that the Governor deemed it expedient to have his door locked and barred, and we could not get in until, after repeated knockings, a second-story front window was opened, raised, and the Governor in person leaned out and asked who was there and what was wanted. I looked up, gave him my name, told him I was there with my division in obedience to his orders, and had taken possession of the arsenal and put my command in a good position. He at once came down, opened the door, and asked us in. After we were seated, I asked for his instructions, and desired to know what he wanted me to do. He said he wished to have his cabinet about him and sent for them. Four or five responded, and he and they asked a variety of questions, among others, if I would obey the order of the Speaker of the Senate. I replied I would not, for that would be sustaining a party who, in my judgment, had acted very improperly and who ought not to be sustained. I said that I had not come for any political purpose, and would not sustain any party in the wrong; that my command was composed of both parties, nearly as many of the one as the other, who would obey any command I gave, because they knew me well enough to know I would not give an improper one. I was also asked if I would obey an order from the Speaker of the House. I said I would not, for two reasons: First, they had organized themselves into two Houses, a Democratic House and a Whig House, and that I then did not know which was the right one. But if there was a regular Speaker I would not obey him, as he had no right to give me orders. I was there in obedience to the commands of the Governor, and would obey no one else, but that I would protect the capitol and the public property and preserve order.

"I was then asked, and pressed for an answer by some of the council or cabinet, if I would obey the orders of the Governor. I replied that I would obey all orders that the Governor had a right to give. One of the questions following was, 'What would you consider a proper order?' I replied, 'I will consider that when the order is given. If ordered to clear the capitol and install in the chair either or both of the Speakers, I would not do it. That must be settled by the senators and representative themselves. If ordered to fire upon those they chose to call rebels, I would not do it, nor would I permit a single shot to be fired, except in self-defense if assailed by the rebels or in the protection of public property.'

"The result was the entire restoration of order in a few days, both Houses reorganizing and electing their Speakers, and David R. Porter being installed as Governor, as he ought to have been.

"I desire to exonerate Governor Ritger from all that was wrong in last days of the Tyler administration a joint resolution passed Congress, which was approved by the President, providing for the annexation of Texas, although the formal admission of that State dates Dec. 24, 1845. In anticipation of a difficulty with Mexico, which never recognized the independence of Texas, and had repudiated the treaty made by Gen. Santa Anna, the President of that country, claiming the country as her own, Gen. Zachary Taylor, then stationed at Fort Jessup, Louisiana, was ordered to form "an army of occupation." In August, 1845, he advanced with about four thousand men to Corpus Christi, at the mouth of the river Nences, which was claimed by Mexico to be the western boundary of Texas. This precautionary measure was not intended by the United States government as a hostile demonstration, and strict orders had been given the commander not "to commit any overt act." In January, 1846, Gen. Taylor was directed to move his forces to the Rio Grande, the boundary claimed by Texas, and also by the United States. This measure brought on the conflict, and the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma resulted, in which the American arms were victorious.

President Polk at once announced to Congress, then in session, that Mexico had "invaded our territory and shed the blood of our fellow-citizens on our own soil." That body formally declared that war with Mexico existed, authorized the President to accept fifty thousand volunteers, and appropriated the sum of ten millions of dollars to carry on the war.

In the patriotic enthusiasm which supervened, three hundred thousand men offered their services to the government. To Pennsylvania two regiments were awarded, and upon Governor Shunk's call for troops, really ere the call was issued, the number of companies tendered exceeded ten times the requisition. At the capitol there were several well-disciplined volunteer companies, all of whom expressed a willingness to go to Mexico.

At this juncture, Capt. E. C. Williams, of the Dauphin Guards, raised a company whose services were offered the Governor. These were the Cameron Guards. It was an entirely new organization, some of the men raw recruits, when Capt. Williams presented the roll to Governor Shunk. As stated, there were offers of old organized companies, drilled and equipped, to the number of two hundred; some, however, hesitated to enlist for "during the war."

The Governor did not at first accept Capt. Williams' company on account of its not being a regular organization, and absolutely refused the tender of this matter, and it was altogether wrong, because I believed then and believe now that he was forced into it by a set of unscrupulous officials who had surrounded him.

"I heard afterwards that some of the so-called rebels had given as high as five dollars for buckshot cartridges to take home with them to show the savage disposition of the soldiery and the terrible dangers they had gone through."

men. Nothing daunted, through the earnest solicitations of Col. James Ross Snowden, Gen. Purviance, Hon. Jesse Miller, Secretary of the Commonwealth, Col. Henry Petriken, his deputy, and Col. Jacob Seifer, chief clerk in the latter department, and that the capital of the State should be represented in the war, Governor Shunk yielded, finally accepting the company.

The Cameron Guards left Harrisburg on the 26th of December, 1846, with one hundred and seventeen men, fully equipped, for Pittsburgh, via Chambersburg. From the latter point the company marched the entire distance, arriving at Pittsburgh the fourth day, traveling one hundred and fifty miles, encountering in the mountains fifteen inches of snow. The difficulties of the march were amply compensated by the hospitable treatment of the citizens along the entire route.

At Pittsburgh the company were at once mustered into the United States service by Lieut. Field, U.S.A., on the 2d of January, 1847, and shortly after embarked on a steamer for New Orleans, which city was reached in about five days. The troops were encamped on the historic battle-field where the American army under Gen. Jackson defeated the British force on the 8th of January, 1815. Here they were detained several days, when they embarked on sailing vessels destined for the island of Lobos, in the Gulf of Mexico. The vessel on which were the Cameron Guards was forty-one days on the passage, encountering northeast storms one after the other, and it was supposed that all had gone down in one of the severe squalls. While on shipboard the small-pox made its appearance through two men who were taken from the hospital at New Orleans. Under the skill of Dr. James Grimshaw, a sergeant of the Cameron Guards, the disease was modified, and all save Capt. Williams took it in its mild form. In consequence they were not allowed at first to land at Lobos, and hoisted the yellow flag until the entire army and navy had left for the island of Sacrificias. Had it not been, says Capt. Williams, in his "Reminiscences of the Mexican Campaign," for the kindness of Capt. Samuel D. Karns, the sutler, and Capt. George D. Lauman, the command would have greatly suffered, but those gentlemen, at the risk of arrest and punishment, supplied gratuitously the wants of the troops.

On the departure of the army the company was disembarked, and the vessel thoroughly disinfected. As soon, however, as it was deemed perfectly safe the command left for Vera Cruz, reaching there on the evening of the capture and surrender of the fortress, March 29, 1846.

On the 8th of April the American army under Gen. Scott advanced towards the city of Mexico. No resistance was met until the Americans reached the village of Plan del Rio, near the mountain-pass of Cerro Gordo. Here they encountered Santa Anna and his army strongly intrenched. The Mexicans were routed, and the following day the Americans entered Jalapa. Here the Cameron Guards and other Pennsylvania troops halted until the arrival of Gen. Cadwalader, when they moved forward towards Pueblo. Capt. Winder's company of the First Artillery and Capt. Williams' company were ordered in the advance. On reaching the pass at La Hoya, the former occupied the hills on the left, the Cameron Guards on the right, where they remained until the entire army passed that point. They were then directed to make their way to the front and report to Gen. Childs. They had reached their place in line, the troops having halted, when some scouts came riding in at full speed and reported to Gen. Childs, upon which Capt. Williams was ordered one-fourth mile to the front on the main road. He deployed his company as skirmishers to the left, encountered over two hundred Mexicans, fired upon them, killing a number and recapturing a number of horses belonging to the celebrated Texan Ranger, Capt. Walker. Shortly after, firing to the right was heard, when the company, obeying previous orders, advanced in that direction. Reaching the road, Capt. Williams met Lieut. Cochran, of the Voltigeurs, with two mountain howitzers. Moving along together, they soon came upon Capt. Walker and his men, who, dismounted, were in conflict with four or five times their number of Mexicans. The Cameron Guards "went in with a yell," when the Mexicans began to retreat in disorder, all the American companies pursuing them as far as Los Vegas, a village which in the conflict was set on fire. Expecting to be placed under arrest for the latter accident, the officers were considerably relieved when, on the approach of Gen. Childs, he rode up to Capt. Williams and said, "Captain, didn't we show the Mustangs how to fight guerrilla?" From this time that term was applied to the enemy.

The Cameron Guards remained with Winder in the advance until Pueblo was reached, which was on the 15th of May. Here the inhabitants, flocking to see the troops, were grievously disappointed by the plain blue which contrasted so greatly with the gaudy Mexican uniform. They could account for the defeat of their armies only by saying "the American leaders are gray-headed men." The time of enlistment of many of his regiments (one year) expiring, Gen. Scott was compelled to check his victorious career for a while. It was not until the beginning of August that he resumed the march with ten thousand men. The route was a toilsome one over steep ascents to the crest of the Cordilleras, where the beautiful valley of Mexico burst upon their view. Rapidly descending, the army soon reached Ayotla, only fifteen miles from the capital. Thenceforward the route bristled with fortifications.

The command under Winder was ordered to move forward by way of Peñan fortified castle, the Second Pennsylvania in advance, the Cameron Guards in front of it as they came in full view of the stronghold. At that juncture orders came that Col. Duncan had discovered a road which flanked Peñan, which was taken.

Nothing of importance transpired relating to the part taken by the Cameron Guards in the siege of Mexico until the bombardment of the citadel of Chapultepec. At the commencement, Capt. Williams, with two companies, was thrown into a ditch, where they remained a day and a night. On the morning thereafter, having been relieved in the evening, they were again ordered into the ditch to protect Drum's battery, with further instructions that when the Second Pennsylvania, New York, and South Carolina regiments would come down the road to take their place in line to join the storming party on Chapultepec.

As soon as these commands appeared on the road beyond Drum's battery, Capt. Williams and Capt. Hire's companies took their place, the Second Pennsylvania being in the rear. The regiments charged in that position. Between the road and the citadel there were numerous ditches, only one, that nearest the wall of the castle, containing water. The firing was terrific. The New York and South Carolina regiments took to the ditches, while the Second Pennsylvania volunteers crossed the field and ditches by flank and reached the wall in good order. Capt. Fairchild and two or three of his men were all the troops which had reached there when the Second Pennsylvania passed through the breach in the wall made by Drum's battery. It advanced up the hill in the face of a galling fire by right of companies, under command of Maj. Brindle, Col. Geary being wounded. Gen. Pillow's command had just preceded the Second Pennsylvania, and the latter were over the ditch and in the castle almost the same moment.

Capt. Samuel Montgomery and Capt. E. C. Williams raised the first American flag on the citadel of Chapultepec, and kept it flying there until the commander-in-chief, Gen. Scott, rode up the causeway to the citadel. It may be here stated that the Mexican flag was hauled down by a color-sergeant of the Fifth or Sixth United States Infantry, and he was holding the regimental flag at the flagstaff when Capts. Williams and Montgomery reached the top of the castle. The only other flag there besides those mentioned was one held by a captain of the Voltigeur regiment, who was wounded in the head, and that at the first ditch previously referred to. He was Capt. Bernard, of Philadelphia, and the colors a small blue flag.

In this gallant charge the Cameron Guards lost eighteen men in killed and wounded, and Capt. Williams received a slight wound in the shoulder.

A forward movement was soon made, the regulars advancing on Casa Mata causeway, while Drum's battery and Quitman's and Shields' brigades were to protect them from being attacked on the San Antonio causeway by the Mexicans from the Garreta de Belina.

Shields and Quitman were to hold the enemy in check and not to attack the Garreta, as it was deemed almost impregnable. The first arches of the aqueduct being filled with large stones up to the first Mexican battery that was soon captured, and thus the Americans approached the city, capturing arch after arch until the gates of the Mexican capital were reached. At 4 P.M. the Second Pennsylvania were inside the city, with the mounted rifles on foot. The firing ceased as the darkness cast its shadows upon the scene, when the Pennsylvanians filled sand-bags for temporary breastworks for protection. This was a labor of great difficulty, owing to the scarcity of implements necessary and the hardness of the soil. However, on the approach of early dawn, a Mexican officer with a flag of truce appeared, and the city of Mexico—the halls of the Montezumas—surrendered to the gallant Quitman.

The general immediately ordered Lieut.-Col. Geary to take command of the citadel with his regiment. On reaching there Capt. Williams had the honor of being made officer of the day, and raised the flag which had been raised at Chapultepec, and when Gens. Quitman and Shields marched with the remainder of their brigades to the Grand Plaza, the troops saluted and cheered this flag as they passed by. We make mention of these facts, for subsequently in the Senate of the United States a resolution was offered to present a sword to Capt. Brooks, of the regular army, for raising the first American flag in the city of Mexico, but it failed from the fact that a statement was presented by Gen. Quitman, Col. Geary, and others to the effect that the first flag raised in the city was by a company in the Second Pennsylvania Regiment. Why Col. Geary should have said "a company of his regiment" when he saw Capt. Williams raise the colors of the Union is unaccountable,—"honor to whom honor's due."

And thus ended the war with Mexico. Within six months Gen. Scott had stormed the strongest places in the country, won battles against armies double, treble, and even quadruple his own, and marched without a single reverse from Vera Cruz to Mexico. He had lost fewer men, made fewer mistakes, and caused less devastation in proportion to his victories than any invading general of former times. When the Duke of Wellington was asked by a great soldier what he thought of Scott's Mexican campaign, his reply was, "It was a war of miracles!"

The capture of the city of Mexico finished the war. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was concluded Feb. 2, 1848. New Mexico and Upper California were ceded to the United States, and the western boundary of Texas was fixed at the Rio Grande del Norte. In return the United States agreed to pay fifteen millions of dollars, and to assume the debts due American citizens by the Mexican government to the amount of three million five hundred dollars. The war cost the United States about twenty-five thousand men (most of whom had died by disease) and one hundred and sixty million dollars.

The Army of Mexico was soon on their way homeward, especially the volunteers, the regulars occupying the acquired territory or the boundary on the Rio Grande. The Cameron Guards, out of one hundred and seventeen, returned with thirty-two men. From the time the company left the city of New Orleans until they reached Harrisburg it was one continuous ovation. At Harrisburg, which they reached on the — day of July, 1848, the citizens turned out en masse to welcome the gallant survivors of that brave band. The company was met at the foot of Market Street by the citizens and military, who, after escorting it through the principal streets of the borough, amid the ringing of bells and the firing of cannon, repaired to the public grounds in the rear of the State Capitol, where the survivors were publicly welcomed by Edward A. Lesley, Esq., on behalf of the citizens, in an eloquent speech replete with patriotic allusions. The entire multitude then sat down to an elegant and plentiful repast, which had been provided for the occasion free of all expense.

The Cameron Guards left Harrisburg, as stated, with one hundred and seventeen men. At Pittsburgh it was found that the company had more than the maximum number, and the surplus was transferred to other commands. This statement will account for the number on the muster-roll herewith given, which contains the names of ninety-four men, rank and file, not including three privates subsequently connected with the company.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The War for the Union—War Meeting at Harrisburg—Arbitrary Arrests—First Northern Invasion by the Army of Lee—The Gettysburg Campaign—The Close of the Rebellion—The Assassination of President Lincoln.

It will be impossible within the limits of a local history to present all the details connected with Dauphin County and the city of Harrisburg in the war for the suppression of the Rebellion. We propose, however, to give the main facts of that eventful period. On the causes which led to it we shall not dwell. Suffice it to say that when the news reached the North of the firing upon Fort Sumter there was but one feeling actuating the people of that section,—to put down civil rebellion at all hazards. The North was united, and the history of this locality was not to be misunderstood. Harrisburg being the capital of the State, it became the theatre of much of interest connected with the Rebellion.

On Tuesday afternoon, April 17, 1861, called together by the exigency of events, the people of Harrisburg and the county of Dauphin assembled in mass-meeting at the court-house, William H. Kepner, mayor of the city, presiding. The meeting was exceedingly large and enthusiastic, and neither before or since did such a gathering of the staid, substantial, and honored citizens of this city assemble. Upon the organization of the meeting the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"WHEREAS, War has been commenced by the seceded States of South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, and Texas upon the American Union without just cause, and against the dictates of reason and justice; and,

"WHEREAS, Fort Sumter, erected by the common treasure of all the American people and garrisoned by a noble but feeble band of American soldiery, has been assailed and conquered by an overwhelming force acting under the authority of the self-styled Southern Confederacy; and,

"WHEREAS, Threats have been openly and boldly made by high officials in the seceded States that the capital of the Union would be speedily attacked and subjugated and the Northern States invaded; therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the people of the capital of Pennsylvania, actuated by a sincere love for the institutions bequeathed us by the fathers of the Union, pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor in defense of our national flag and the Constitution of the United States, and that we will resist unitedly and firmly all acts of aggression on the part of those who have wretchedly insulted our government, outraged our honor, and assailed our rights as citizens of a great and hitherto happy country.

"Resolved, That we hold it to be the duty of all good citizens, no matter what their political predilections may be, to respond promptly to the demand of the President of the United States for men 'to maintain the honor, the integrity, and the existence of our national Union and the perpetuity of our popular government, and to redeem the wrongs already long enough endured,' and that those who by voice or act endeavor to prevent the accomplishment of these ends, and thus give aid and comfort to our enemies, can only be considered as traitors and the abettors of treason.

"Resolved, That the message of Governor Curtin recommending that measures be taken to place the militia of Pennsylvania in an efficient condition was eminently appropriate and patriotic; and the prompt and liberal manner in which the Legislature responded to that demand, as well as its more recent act pledging all the resources of the Commonwealth to aid in the defense of the Federal government, is gratifying to all loyal citizens and true patriots.

"Resolved, That the martial spirit evinced by our gallant volunteers and citizens generally in rallying at their country's call to march to its defense is conclusive evidence that they are not degenerate sons of sires who fought for liberty and honor in the Revolution and in the war of 1812, and is a certain guarantee that the Keystone State will be found now, as she was in the late war with Mexico, foremost in the maintenance of our national rights."

On motion of Mr. George Bergner, the following were unanimously adopted additional thereto:

"Resolved, That we hail with proud satisfaction the unanimous passage of the following resolution by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and that we adopt the same as our motto, viz:

"Resolved by the Senate, etc., that the faith, credit, and resources of the State in both men and money are hereby pledged to any amount and to every extent to which the Federal government may determine to subdue the Rebellion, to punish treason, to enforce the laws, to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the people, and to maintain inviolate the Constitution and sovereignty of the people."

A. B. Hamilton offered the following resolution, which was also unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That Gen. E. C. Williams, Capt. Isaac S. Waterbury, and Maj. Leander N. Ott be requested to serve as a committee to act for this meeting as collectors and custodians of such money as may come to their hands as a fund for the support and sustenance of those citizens of Dauphin County who may volunteer under call of the President during the time of their preparatory services at home, and as far as possible to comfort and sustain the families of those who shall be thus absent, engaged in the service of their country."

In accordance with the resolution, A. B. Hamilton and George Bergner subscribed fifty dollars each for this object; and a paper pledging the subscribers as loyal citizens of Pennsylvania and the United States was then signed by all who could approach the table, after which the meeting adjourned with three hearty cheers for the Union. After the meeting Col. Worrell, being called upon, addressed the meeting in earnest advocacy of the Union cause.

In the mean time (April 13th) a meeting of young men of Harrisburg had been held at Exchange Hall for the purpose of organizing a military company, and thirty-five persons signed the roll. The company thus formed took the name of State Capital Guards, and elected Isaac S. Waterbury captain, through whom their services were tendered to Governor Curtin. The Cameron Guards tendered their services about the same time, and the Constitutional Guards were organized soon after in the north committee room of the capitol. At this juncture of affairs Governor Curtin requested Capt. E. C. Williams to take possession of the grounds of the Harrisburg Park Association, adjoining the northern boundary of the city, and to make all necessary arrangements for all troops arriving in the city. Col. Seneca G. Simmons being present and an officer of the United States army, Capt. Williams was immediately mustered into service, being the first volunteer in the war. The order was to organize the fair grounds as a camp and name it Camp Union, but upon taking possession of it named it Camp Curtin, by which it was known not only by all the State volunteers, but by the citizen-soldiers of different sections of the Union. At once Harrisburg and Camp Curtin became important points for the concentration of the Federal troops and the centre of military operations for a period of four years.

In the following pages are preserved the record of companies and regiments, with such historic data as we have been able to ascertain. Much more ought to be given, and will probably be looked for by the interested reader, yet the details and itinerary of each command, valuable though they may be, are too voluminous.

The first scene at Harrisburg in the terrible tragedy enacted in the struggle for the Union was the call to arms and the establishment of the military camp, the march of the soldiers to the sanguinary fields of the hitherto fair South; the next when, after the second battle of Manassas, the rebel army threatened Pennsylvania; the third when the second invasion of the enemy brought the conflict to our very doors; and the fourth when the sound of victory went through the land, followed by the martyrdom of the lion-hearted Lincoln. These are chapters in the history of this locality which it is necessary to dwell upon, leaving to other pens at a future time the various incidents of the march to the front, the return home, and other facts connected with that military epoch.

We come now to a portion of war history that is not very creditable to the government authorities at the time. We had thought at the first to avoid alluding to the matter at all; but the occasion demands some reference, and as a faithful chronicler the subject cannot be dismissed. During the Rebellion the War Department made every other power subservient to it, and many arrests and trials took place which were not only arbitrary and unconstitutional, but at the time wholly unnecessary and without justification, palliation, or excuse, and our reference is a case in point.

The Constitution of the United States has provided in the third article that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where such crime shall have been committed." And then in the amendments to the Constitution, Article v., that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger," "nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." And in Article vi., "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury in the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

Our State Legislature, in order to prevent any person from giving aid or assistance to the Rebellion, passed an act on the 18th of April, 1861, by which, in one lengthy section they provide for every possible case in which any person could give aid or comfort to the "enemies of this State or the United States of America," and also where any one should persuade any person or persons from entering the service of this State or the United States, "or induce any person to abandon the service," and enacting that "every person so offending, and being legally convicted thereof, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be sentenced to undergo solitary imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor not exceeding ten years, or be fined in a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, at the discretion of the court."

In a strong legal paper prepared by the late Herman Alricks, since we are referring to military arrests, are some facts which are well worth reproducing in this connection. He writes,—

"The people of this whole land ought to understand that the Constitution of the United States is the foundation of our government, and the Supreme Court of the United States is the judicial expounder of the Constitution. If the Supreme Court of the United States can be so manipulated by Congress as to become a political partisan institution instead of a judicial one, and the Constitution can be construed in such a way as to contravene the whole genius of our government in establishing a military despotism over the whole land because of a partial rebellion, that there is an end to all appeal to civil government. The people must either submit to this military despotism in the hands of the War Department or offer open resistance and stand upon their rights guaranteed to them by our form of government. It would be useless to talk of amending the Constitution or making a new one, for if a Constitution framed by Washington and the men of the Revolution can be treated with contempt and disregarded no reasonable man would suppose that a Constitution made by the men of the present day or by the men of any future generation would be regarded. . . . It was never intended by the framers of the Constitution to confer upon the military the powers that have been claimed and exercised by them in the late war. . . . It is very evident that the construction put upon the Constitution by the War Department in the late war on the subject of military arrests and military trials leaves to the citizen living in a State not in rebellion no personal security whatever, and treats him as if he lived in a land where the government is a sheer military despotism. Whether the people of the United States are willing to allow the construction of the War Department to stand as a precedent in case of another insane rebellion or not is a question of such vast import as ought to command the attention of the people of this whole land from the Atlantic to the Pacific."

On the 6th of August, 1862, the editors and proprietors of the Harrisburg Patriot and Union were arrested by Provost-Marshal Lafayette C. Baker, of Washington, D. C., on complaint of Capt. R. I. Dodge, then acting as mustering officer and provost-marshal at Harrisburg. The arrests were made under authority of Gen. Halleck, general-in-chief of the army, whose order was executed by Brig.-Gen. James Wadsworth, acting Military Governor of the District of Columbia, assisted by Provost-Marshal Baker, Capt. Dodge, and Chief of Police Campbell. Gen. Wadsworth at once conveyed the prisoners to Washington, where they were incarcerated in the Old Capitol Prison. The offense of which they were accused was the publication of a handbill discouraging enlistments. This handbill was as follows:

"ATTENTION, COLORED MEN!

"The great Gen. James Lane has arrived in this city to-day, and will address the colored citizens of Harrisburg in front of the Market-House at four o'clock this (Monday) afternoon. Men and brethren, come along.

"The government having granted him permission to raise two COLORED REGIMENTS, he will be prepared to swear in all able-bodied colored men who may offer, and he confidently expects to raise one company in this place.

"Arms, equipment, uniforms, pay, rations, and honesty the same as received by white soldiers, and no distinction will be made. Come one, come all.

"J. H. TOMPKINS,

"Recruiting Officer for Lane's Colored Regiments."

The effect of this publication, it was claimed by the friends of the administration, was to excite the prejudices of those persons who, though in favor of crushing the Rebellion, were opposed to the employment of colored troops, and to embarrass the recruiting officers in the work of procuring enlistments. The Patriot and Union declared on the morning after the arrest that the placard was "got up by frolicsome printer boys without the knowledge of the editors or proprietors of that newspaper," but the Telegraph asserted that evidence had been procured showing that the handbill had been printed in the Patriot and Union establishment, and that two of the boys in the office had confessed "that they had 'set up' the bill calling on colored recruits, and that Uriah J. Jones had concocted and written the same." Acting upon this evidence, Provost-Marshal Dodge telegraphed to the War Department for instructions, and the result was the arrest as stated. After an examination before Judge-Advocate Turner, in the presence of Gen. Wadsworth, the prisoners were released on the 22d of August, 1862, having first made the statement under oath that they were unconscious of having committed any offense against the Constitution, the government, or the laws of the land. They left Washington on the following morning, Aug. 23, 1862, and arrived at Harrisburg on the evening of the same day. They were greeted by a large assemblage of citizens, who escorted them to their homes.

The order for the arrests, it may be here stated, directed also that the provost-marshal should "seize the presses, type, fixtures, and all the property found in the Patriot and Union printing establishment, and turn the same over to the United States quartermaster at Harrisburg, Pa., who shall forward the same to Washington City." This portion of the order, however, was never executed, and the publication of the Patriot and Union was continued without interruption.

On the 5th of September, 1862, after the second battle of Manassas, the Confederate army under Gen. Lee crossed the Potomac River near the mouth of the Monocacy, and advanced northward through Maryland, threatening Harrisburg among other important points. An invasion of Pennsylvania seemed imminent and the excitement was widespread. While the main body of the army remained at Frederick, Md., the Confederate cavalry entered Pennsylvania, their number being greatly exaggerated by rumor. In the excited state of the people it was believed that the whole army was advancing towards the State capital with the purpose of moving thence upon Philadelphia. In anticipation of the advance of the enemy northward, Governor Curtin on the 4th of September issued a proclamation recommending "the immediate formation throughout the commonwealth of militia companies and regiments in conformity with the militia act of 1855." In accordance with this recommendation, the citizens of Harrisburg met in their respective wards on the afternoon of the 5th, for the purpose of organizing companies to aid in repelling the advance of the enemy. The places of business were generally closed to enable the employes to participate in the movement. After an informal organization the companies from the different wards marched to the capitol grounds, where they assembled around the steps of the rear of the main building and were addressed by Governor Curtin, ex-Governor Porter, "Parson" Brownlow, and Rev. Francis Moore, of the Locust Street Methodist Episcopal Church. News of the invasion of Maryland reached Harrisburg on the night of Saturday, September 6th. The dispatch stated that the rebels had entered Frederick with forty thousand men, and were marching on Hagerstown. "This of course," said the Telegraph of September 8th, "aroused our citizens considerably, believing that the enemy might march undisturbed down through the Cumberland Valley." A dispatch contradicting this report was received on Sunday morning, and the people of Harrisburg were kept in a state of suspense throughout that day and part of Monday. On Monday afternoon, however, the Telegraph announced that it had direct information from several gentlemen who had left Frederick on the previous day that a portion of the Confederate army had reached that place. Further reports by telegraph added that all the government stores had been removed from Hagerstown, Md., to Chambersburg, and that a large number of Union men had left the former town for places of safety in Pennsylvania.

On the 9th of September the appointment was announced of A. K. McClure, Assistant Adjutant-General of the United States, with the rank of major, and detailed for special duty in Pennsylvania, where he was assigned the service of arranging such defenses in the State as the emergency demanded. In the mean time, in view of the threatened danger from the rebel advance, recruiting proceeded rapidly. The ranks of the Reserve Brigade and Home Guard soon filled up, and new companies were raised in nearly every ward in the city. On the 10th, Governor Curtin issued General Order No. 35, in which he stated that, "In view of the danger of invasion now threatening our State by the enemies of the government, it is deemed necessary to call upon all the able-bodied men of Pennsylvania to organize immediately for the defense of the State and be ready for marching orders upon one hour's notice, to proceed to such point of rendezvous as the Governor may direct." Organizations called into the field under this order were to be held for service for such time only as the pressing exigency for State defense continued. On the following day (September 11th) the Telegraph said, "We have the gratifying intelligence that the people are turning out en masse to defend the free soil of Pennsylvania. Dispatches from all the adjoining counties were received last night at headquarters, offering any number of troops for the defense of the capital of the State. . . . Gen. Wool takes command to-day. A number of competent engineers are here to complete the fortifications." In the same issue it was noted that "the train from Chambersburg brought a considerable number of passengers from beyond that town," from whom it was learned that "the excitement and panic in that direction are intense and fearful." On the same train came "a large number of contrabands." On the afternoon of the same day Governor Curtin issued the following proclamation :

"HEADQUARTERS PENNSYLVANIA MILITIA,

"General Order No. 36.

"By authority of the President of the United States, fifty thousand of the freemen of Pennsylvania are hereby called for immediate service, to repel the now imminent danger from invasion by the enemies of the country.

"Officers in command of company organizations, as authorized by General Order No. 35, dated September 10th, will at once report by telegraph the place of their headquarters, so that orders may be issued from these headquarters for transportation to Harrisburg for such companies as may be ordered to move.

"Further calls will be made for additional forces as the exigencies of the service may require. The formation of companies under the General Order of September 10th should continue to be made as rapidly as possible, until all the able-bodied, loyal men of Pennsylvania are enrolled and ready for service.

"By order of

"Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

"A. L. RUSSELL, Adjutant-General, Pennsylvania."

On the 12th Mayor Kepner issued the following proclamation :

"TO THE CITIZENS AND OTHERS NOW WITHIN THE CITY OF HARRISBURG.

"In pursuance of the command of his Excellency A. G. Curtin, Governor of this commonwealth, dated this day, to me directed, I forbid every able-bodied man from leaving the bounds of this city upon the pain of being arrested and held in charge by the military authorities under the instructions given to them for that purpose by the Governor.

"All railroad companies and their agents located at this city are also hereby notified and positively forbidden to carry off or furnish transportation for the purpose of carrying off any and all able-bodied men from this city.

"The Provost Guard detailed for duty in this city are hereby directed to take care that the above proclamation be enforced.

"WM. H. KEPNER,

"Mayor.

"MAYOR'S OFFICE, HARRISBURG, September 12, 1862."

At this date it was noted in the local press that the most active measures were being put in force to assemble a large army to resist invasion, "and if possible save the capital and State from devastation and outrage from the enemies of the government. By this evening fifty thousand men will be in motion. All the rolling stock of the different railroads in the State will be taken possession of for the purpose of conveying troops to this city. An engineer corps is at work on the other side of the river, surveying the ground in all directions, and arranging the plans for the erection of works."

Meanwhile the troops raised for the defense of the Cumberland Valley and Harrisburg were concentrating at Chambersburg under the command of

Gen. John F. Reynolds, of the regular army. Col. Charles Campbell was appointed with the rank of brigadier to the command of a force from the camps at Harrisburg, which was ordered to proceed up the Cumberland Valley. Capt. G. D. Hand was acting adjutant-general, Capt. Elbridge McConkey acting assistant adjutant-general, Maj. R. H. McCoy, chief quartermaster. On the 13th it was announced that over two hundred companies had reported themselves to the Governor for service, and that Governor Curtin had left Harrisburg on the previous day to visit the forces in the field at Chambersburg and other points in the valley. A strong reserve was maintained at Camp Curtin, ready to march at a moment's notice. From Saturday evening, September 13th, in the night which followed and all day Sunday, as fast as one train of cars on the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Lebanon Valley, and the Northern Central could discharge its living cargo another steamed into the city filled with volunteers. Tents were erected on the capitol grounds for the accommodation of the fresh levies, and the medical department had a large hospital tent immediately in front of the arsenal, where the recruits were supplied with medicine and medical advice. Gen. Reynolds arrived in the city on Saturday evening, September 13th, and immediately organized his staff and issued his first order as follows:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF PENNSYLVANIA,

"General Order No. 1.

"I. In pursuance of orders from War Department and His Excellency, Governor Curtin, the undersigned assumes command of the forces assembled for the defense of Pennsylvania.

II. The following-named officers are announced as the staff of the general command, and will be obeyed and respected accordingly:

"Capt. C. Kingsbury, Jr., assistant adjutant-general.

"Edward McPherson, volunteer aide-de-camp.

"Lieut. C. Simborn, aide-de-camp.

"Lieut. William Biddle, aide-de-camp.

"JOHN F. REYNOLDS,
"Brigadier-General Volunteers.

"Official.

"C. KINGSBURY, JR.,

"Assistant Adjutant-General."

Troops continued to pour into Harrisburg until, on the 16th, it was announced that there were volunteers in the city from every county in the State. "Camp Curtin," it was stated, "is full to overflowing; the capitol grounds are now literally covered with tents; the Senate and House of Representatives are used as barracks; every room in the capitol, not occupied for other purposes, is now filled with troops; the vacant rooms in the court-house are appropriated to the soldiers; wherever there is a spot that will accommodate a weary soldier it is seized upon and used according to 'the articles of war.' The hotels are like bee-hives, swarming; private houses are open, their accommodations at once cordial and free to all who choose to enter; and thus the State capital is one vast camp, where the soldier is at liberty to bivouac on the street-corner, in our most elegant mansions, the capitol grounds or the capitol buildings."

The First Regiment Pennsylvania Militia, under command of Col. Henry McCormick, composed mainly of residents of Harrisburg, left the city on September 13th for Chambersburg, and went into camp at a point about two miles above Chambersburg, on the Franklin Railroad, the military station being known as Camp McClure.

The Dauphin County cavalry, commanded by Capt. E. Byers, with Lieuts. Boyd, Peters, and Murray, and Charles C. Rawn, as orderly, accompanied the regiment. Capt. James Gowan also recruited a company of cavalry in Dauphin County at this time.

On the 17th it was announced that the troops were in possession of every public building in Harrisburg. Churches, schools, hose- and engine-houses, and the capitol buildings, the depots, and in fact every accessible edifice which could be used for the shelter and accommodation of troops was secured by the authorities or voluntarily given up for the purpose. As fast as transportation could be secured the troops were moved off in the direction of the Cumberland Valley. During this critical period the duties of provost guard in Harrisburg were performed by the First City Zouaves, Company A, One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, Capt. F. Asbury Aul. The Harrisburg Greys (Ex-empts), Valentine Hammel, Jr., captain, also remained in the city, prepared to render their services should occasion arise.

On the 18th of September the following card from the Secretary of the Commonwealth was telegraphed to the principal postmasters in the State, with the request that they would place it in some conspicuous position:

"HARRISBURG, SEPT. 18, 1862.

"The number of wounded in Gen. McClellan's recent battles is very large; most of them will probably be brought into Pennsylvania. The surgeon-general appeals to the ladies for the immediate contribution of such articles as are needed for their comfort. All packages should have contents marked outside, and be addressed to Gen. Hale, Harrisburg.

"ELI SLIFER,
"Secretary of Commonwealth."

Sept. 19, 1862, the appointment was announced of Brig.-Gen. Harry Longnecker to the command of a brigade composed of a portion of the regiments called out by Governor Curtin for the defense of the border, with Col. John J. Patterson as aid. The battle of Antietam, which was fought on the 16th and 17th of September, resulted in the retreat of Gen. Lee's army across the Potomac, and dissipated all apprehensions of a Confederate advance upon Harrisburg at that time. During the morning of the 16th, Capt. George Brooks, of Harrisburg, of the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania Regiment, was shot and fatally wounded.

After the result at Antietam orders were telegraphed to the various military headquarters throughout the State that the militia companies then organizing in the different localities need not march to Harrisburg, as the exigency which made it necessary to call out the militia had been surmounted, and all danger of invasion passed. On the 20th of September, Gen. Reynolds issued an order that the Pennsylvania militia should return to their own border, and on the 21st orders were issued to break up the military camps on the capitol grounds at Harrisburg. In a short time the men were on the march to the depot, and trains soon began to depart with the troops on their way home. On the 23d, Mayor Kepner was instructed by the Governor to remove the restrictions on travel, and persons were once more free to leave the city without passes.

On the 24th the Harrisburg companies, forming part of the First Regiment, which had arrived the evening before, marched through the principal streets of the city, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Robert A. Lamberton. On the same day, Governor Curtin issued a proclamation, thanking the troops, congratulating them on the character of the service they had rendered, and discharging them from further duty. In this proclamation the Governor said,—

"Although not required by the terms of the call to pass the borders of the State, our brave men, unused to the rigors of war and untrained in military movements, not only entered Maryland, but held Hagerstown against an advancing foe, pressed forward to the Potomac, and resisted the threatened movement of the rebels upon Williamsport, until troops in the United States service arrived and relieved them. Their timely and heroic action has saved the State from the tread of an invading enemy, whose necessities made even military strategy subordinate to plunder."

The brigade which held the position at Williamsport, referred to by Governor Curtin, was commanded by Col. Henry McCormick, acting brigadier, and the First Regiment (from Harrisburg) was stationed on the extreme left in the position of honor and danger.

After defeating the Northern army under Gen. Hooker at Chancellorsville, May 2 and 3, 1863, Gen. Lee determined if possible to transfer the scene of hostilities north of the Potomac. His design having become apparent at the North, Governor Curtin, on the 12th of June, issued a proclamation announcing that the President had erected two new departments, one in Eastern Pennsylvania, commanded by Maj.-Gen. D. N. Couch, and the other in Western Pennsylvania, commanded by Maj.-Gen. Brooks, and urging upon the people of Pennsylvania the importance of immediately raising a sufficient force for the defense of the State. An engineer force began on the 15th the erection of earthworks and other defenses on the Cumberland side of the Susquehanna River, immediately opposite Harrisburg. To these the name of Fort Washington was given. Other works were erected at other points, both along the river and on the different railroads. On the same day Lieut.-Col. Romford, appointed assistant provost-general for the State of Pennsylvania, arrived at Harrisburg and entered upon the discharge of his duties, and Governor Curtin issued a proclamation calling for fifty thousand troops to repel the threatened invasion of Pennsylvania. A meeting of citizens of Harrisburg was also held at the court-house on the 15th to devise measures for the protection of the city. On motion, Gen. Simon Cameron was called to the chair. After explaining the object of the meeting and urging immediate action, Gen. Cameron suggested that committees be appointed to wait upon the Governor and Gen. Couch and ask them to be present and explain what they desired the citizens to do and how to assist in the defense of the city. In accordance with this suggestion, George Bergner, Dr. A. Patterson, and Judge McKinney were appointed the committee to wait upon the Governor; William Bostick, Sheriff Boas, and Hon. John C. Kunkel to wait on Gen. Couch. A committee to wait on Maj. Romford was also appointed, consisting of Col. T. C. MacDowell, D. J. Unger, and Weidman Forster. On motion it was resolved that one hundred scouts be sent up the valley, and Col. F. K. Boas offered the following, which was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we individually and collectively pledge the last dollar and last man in defense of the State in its present emergency."

Mr. Bergner, from the committee, introduced the Governor, who explained the state of affairs and urged all to prepare at once for self-defense. Gen. Couch was then introduced, and spoke in a similar strain. Col. Kunkel offered a roll which he had prepared, the signers of which pledged themselves to defend the city to the uttermost. The roll was at once signed by a large number, headed by Gen. Simon Cameron. Mr. Snyder had prepared a roll calling upon the young men to organize, which was also numerously signed.

A call was immediately issued, as follows:

"All loyal men who desire to enter the service with the undersigned will form companies at once and report at my residence, No. 43 North Second Street, in this city, immediately."

"Remember there is no time to lose, as the rebels are now at Hagerstown, and are pushing for this city. Let there be no delay, unless you wish to see the capital of the State and your own fireside laid in waste by the invading rebels."

The following notices were issued at the same time:

"All persons who wish to join a cavalry company are requested to meet at the livery office of Frank Murray, in Fourth Street near Walnut, this evening at seven o'clock, for the purpose of organizing a company."

"The members of the Fourth Ward company of Pennsylvania militia are earnestly urged to meet promptly this evening at seven o'clock at the Hope Engine house to prepare to defend our homes."

"E. CUNZON, Captain."

"June 15, 1863."

"Attention, firemen and citizens of the Fifth and Sixth Wards! A meeting will be held at the Good Will Engine house this evening at seven and a half o'clock to form a military company to fight in defense of Harrisburg."

"W. K. VERBEKE,

"President of the Good Will Fire Company."

"Attention, Russell Guards! A meeting of Company F, One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, will be held at the Hope Engine house this evening at seven o'clock."

"The members of Company B, One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, are requested to meet at the captain's office this evening at six o'clock to take action on the call of the Governor for men to repel the threatened invasion of our State."

"First City Troop of Harrisburg will meet at the public-house of Quartermaster Peters, Farmers' Hotel, this (Wednesday) evening at seven o'clock. J. B. Boyd, first lieutenant."

"The young men of the city of Harrisburg desirous of connecting themselves with an organization for State defense will meet at Wagner's Hotel, corner of Second and Chestnut Streets, this evening at seven o'clock."

"First City Zouaves.—The old members of this corps, and all others desirous of joining the same, are requested to repair to the headquarters at once. . . . Company B, One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment, is also cordially invited to join with us in a common cause."

"Capt. Val. B. Hummel, late a member of the Anderson Body-Guard, which did such effectual service under Gen. Rosecrans during the year and a half they were with him, is raising a volunteer cavalry company in this city. . . . A meeting will be held at the Exchange this evening at seven o'clock for the purpose of organizing the company."

"This morning a call was made by Capt. E. C. Wilson, assistant quartermaster, U.S.A., at this post, for one thousand men to assist in throwing up the intrenchments on the opposite side of the river. The engineers have already selected the ground for these defenses, and the men as soon as employed are sent over the river and put to work."

"Gen. Cameron publicly declared to-day that he was willing to pledge his entire fortune in defraying the expenses of a regiment to assist in retelling this invasion. He made this offer in good faith to pay the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment at least as long as it would be required for the present emergency."

After this offer had been received from Gen. Cameron the following notice was issued:

"ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

"HARRISBURG, PA.,

"June 15, 1863.

"To the men composing the late One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and all others who desire to aid in the defense of the State in the present emergency:

"The enemy are in force at Hagerstown, Md., and are hourly expected to invade the State and destroy by fire and sword our property and lives. Every volunteer and citizen capable of bearing arms is required to come to the rescue forthwith and defend our State from the intruder. Arrangements have been made for the payment of the troops coming forward under this call, and they will only be required to serve during the present emergency. All are requested to bring with them all the accoutrements they may have, and be uniformed as far as possible. The men will elect the company officers, and the captains will elect the field officers.

"WILLIAM W. JENNINGS,

"Late Colonel One Hundred and Twenty-seventh P. V."

Harrisburg was the general rendezvous of the troops, who, on arriving at the capital, were organized into regiments by Gen. Couch, as part of the army corps of the Susquehanna, which was composed of men who had volunteered "for the protection and defense of public and private property" in the department, to serve during the pleasure of the President or the continuance of the war. On the 18th it was announced that Gen. Milroy had arrived in Harrisburg, and was in consultation with Gen. Couch.

On the same day the following notice appeared:

"Rally, old men! All persons over forty years of age not attached to other military organizations, and willing to defend their homes and families on the Cumberland side of the Susquehanna, will meet in front of the Morgan House, corner of Second and Pine Streets, at ten o'clock A.M. on the 19th inst., to organize and appoint their officers and be ready to march at a moment's warning.

"A SOLDIER OF 1812."

The Twenty-sixth Regiment of militia, largely composed of Harrisburg companies, was organized as rapidly as possible. In addition to the troops from various portions of Pennsylvania which now began to pour into Harrisburg, regiments from other States, notably New Jersey and New York, also came to take part in resisting the threatened invasion. At 9 A.M. on the 18th, Capt. Dodge, chief mustering officer, commenced mustering the troops at Harrisburg. Those at Camp Curtin were sworn in there, and all others were sworn in on Capitol Hill.

On June 19th, at a meeting of citizens too old to be enrolled in the militia, but anxious to do something in defense of their homes and families, at which E. M. Pollock presided, it was

"Resolved, That in order to carry out our intention we proceed to elect officers."

Maj. John Maglauchlin was elected captain, James Porter first lieutenant, and George Krichbaum second lieutenant.

It was also resolved that we hold ourselves in readiness to march at the call of the captain,—at one moment's warning.

On the same day the following proclamation was issued:

"MAYOR'S OFFICE,

"HARRISBURG, JUNE 18, 1863.

"For the preservation of peace and good order in the city it is enjoined on all keepers of retail liquor establishments and lager beer shops to close their bars precisely at 5 P.M. until 5 A.M. the next morning. The mayor expects from every good citizen a faithful and cordial observance of this order.

A. L. ROCHFORD,

"Mayor."

The commandant of Camp Curtin was Gen. James A. Beaver. The Twenty-third New Jersey Regiment was encamped at Camp Yahoo, in Harris' Park. The police of Harrisburg were reinforced by a company of police from Philadelphia, who were armed with muskets in addition to their other weapons. On June 22d a local journal said, "Troops are continually pouring into this city; Camp Curtin, Capitol Hill, the court-house, and every available avenue is filled with men." On Tuesday, June 16th, the Harrisburg Telegraph did not issue a paper, owing to the enlistment of its compositors. It resumed publication, however, on the following day. On June 23d, Capt. James S. Brisbin was appointed chief of cavalry in the Department of the Susquehanna, and established his headquarters at Camp Curtin. A company known as the Curtin Horse Guard, Capt. Jones, was recruited at Harrisburg, and on June 22d was reported as being nearly full. The Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteer Militia completed its organization on the 23d, and was the first in the field from Camp Curtin under the Governor's call.

On the 24th of June news came that the rebels were in the vicinity of Shippensburg, forty-five miles from Harrisburg, and that Gen. Ewell with six brigades was about to march on the latter city. "The farmers in Cumberland Valley," it was added, "are bringing their horses, cattle, and everything movable across the river, and, unless matters change within the next twelve hours, we presume our non-fighting population will again be on the move." On the 25th Capt. Brisbin established a cavalry camp east of the city on the residence of A. Boyd Hamilton, which was known at first as Camp Couch, and afterwards as Camp Brisbin.

The 25th was a day of excitement in Harrisburg, owing to the ingress and egress of people from the Cumberland side of the river, who passed through the city and hurried to a place of safety with their valuables. Their numbers were increased by accessions of refugees from Harrisburg. In view of the popular agitation, Mayor Roumfort issued another proclamation closing the taverns and shops of retail dealers, and forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor until further notice. On the same day the veterans of 1812 called upon Governor Curtin, and tendered their services through Capt. Goslin. The Governor accepted their offer with grateful acknowledgments.

On June 26th, Gen. W. F. Smith was in command of the volunteers on the west bank of the Susquehanna, and it was stated that the fortifications were progressing favorably. On the same day Capt. Edward De Rue announced that he had been requested by a number of persons residing in Harrisburg to raise a company to be the flank company of any regiment to which the members might wish to attach themselves, and stated that he would proceed to do so at once.

On the 26th of June, Governor Curtin issued a proclamation announcing that the enemy was advancing in force into Pennsylvania, with a strong column, twenty-three miles from Harrisburg, and other columns moving by Fulton and Adams Counties, and calling for sixty thousand men to come forward promptly to defend the State. On June 27th it was stated that two companies of colored troops had been organized in Harrisburg within a week. One was commanded by Capt. Henry Bradley, the other by Capt. Thomas M. Chester. On the same day, W. K. Verbeke, president of the Good-Will Fire Company, issued a call for persons to attend at the Good-Will Engine House to form a volunteer company. Similar meetings were held at the courthouse, where the Sharpshooters organized, and at the Second Ward House, Second and Market Streets. . . . On the 29th it was stated that the fortifications at Harrisburg had been finished, and guns were mounted and ready for action. The Citizen Fire-Engine and Hose Company was impressed into active service for the purpose of supplying the troops at the fortifications with water. Colored men were impressed to do the pumping, under the management of George C. Fager, chief engineer. It was also announced that at the tap of the courthouse bell, all men able to bear arms within the city were required to assemble at the bridge and attach themselves to some one of the companies organized for the protection of the city.

June 29. Capt. J. Wesley Awl issued a notice calling upon all persons who had received rifles from the Friendship Engine-house to meet there for the purpose of organizing.

June 30. It was reported that skirmishing had been going on during the afternoon of the 29th, about five miles from Harrisburg. Several shots were fired by the rebels at Union pickets, without doing any damage. It was added that Dr. Malone had established a hospital in the brick tavern at the end of the bridge, west side; and that Sullivan S. Child had been appointed mustering officer at Harrisburg.

Capt. Forster's company, sworn into service on the 29th, was placed on duty near Harrisburg, and on the 30th Capt. F. Asbury Awl's company was placed on duty in the city. The Hope Volunteer Fire Company, Capt. H. H. Hummel, was organized on the same day.

July 1. It was stated that the Southern troops had retreated from the vicinity of Harrisburg and were concentrating between Carlisle and Gettysburg. The Confederate movement culminated in the battle of Gettysburg, fought July 1, 2, and 3, 1863, after which Harrisburg was no longer menaced with danger from Gen. Lee's army.

The war virtually closed with the surrender of Gen. Lee at Appomattox Court-House. The soldiers who had fought on many a field, surviving the bitter conflict of the fratricidal strife, were looking for the peace which was dawning. In the midst of the joy which was filling the breasts of a great and thankful people, in an unlooked-for hour, the hand of the infamous assassin felled the Chief Executive of the Union; Abraham Lincoln fell a martyr to the sworn performance of a high duty. In every portion of the North preparations were being made to celebrate the glorious victory and the return of peace. At Harrisburg these were extensive, and the entire county was invited to participate with the State authority. Alas! how frequently it is realized that "man proposes, but God disposes." The cheer, the joy, and the bright smile gave place very suddenly to the sorrow and gloom and grief at the loss of the noble Lincoln.

On the receipt of the news of the assassination of President Lincoln (April 14, 1865) notice was issued by A. L. Russell, chief marshal of the demonstration to be had at Harrisburg on the 15th, in honor of the victories of the Union army, that the intended procession would be postponed, and all citizens were requested to lower to half-mast the flags provided for the celebration and to drape them in mourning. Citizens were also requested to suspend all business during the day. A public meeting was held at the courthouse, which was called to order by Gen. A. L. Russell, who nominated Hon. John J. Pearson as president. Hon. David Fleming and Henry McCormick were chosen vice-presidents, and George W. Crabb and George Bergner, secretaries. The meeting was opened with prayer by Rev. J. Walker Jackson, and addresses deploring the calamity were delivered by Mayor Roumfort, Herman Alricks, John C. Kunkel, and Rev. J. W. Jackson. At noon all the bells in the city were tolled, and in the afternoon a religious meeting was held in Locust Street Methodist Episcopal Church. A national salute was fired at noon.

On Wednesday, April 19th, the day of the obsequies, the business places in Harrisburg were closed from eleven to three o'clock, and guns were fired from Capitol Hill every half hour from sunrise to sunset. The churches were opened from twelve to one o'clock for religious exercises, and the bells were tolled from eleven to twelve and from one to two. The post-office was closed from eleven to three o'clock. A. L. Roumfort, mayor of Harrisburg, issued a proclamation, requesting that the bells be tolled and that places of business be closed. On the morning of Wednesday, Governor Curtin received a dispatch from Brig.-Gen. Townsend, acting adjutant-general, stating that the President's remains would leave Washington on Friday morning at eight o'clock, to go by way of Baltimore and Harrisburg, and thence to Philadelphia and New York, and inviting the Governor to meet the remains with his staff at such point as he might designate. Governor Curtin at once replied that he proposed to take charge of the remains at the line of the State, and to accompany them until they left the State. He further proposed that they should be placed in the State capitol while in Harrisburg, and added that all military and civic honors would be shown them. In accordance with this arrangement, Gen. Cadwallader, commanding the department of Pennsylvania, was instructed to meet the remains upon their entry within his jurisdiction and accompany them to Harrisburg. Governor Curtin then issued the following proclamation:

"The remains of the murdered patriot, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, will arrive in the State on Friday evening next on their way to the place of interment in Illinois. They will come from Baltimore to Harrisburg; thence will on Saturday be conveyed to Philadelphia, and thence on Monday morning to New York. I shall meet them at the State line and take charge of them while in the commonwealth. I recommend that all business be suspended during their passage through the State, and that the local authorities and people everywhere join the State authorities heartily in paying honor to the memory of the martyred statesman who has fallen a victim to the savage treason of assassins.

"By the Governor.

"ELI SLIFER,

"Secretary of the Commonwealth.

"A. G. CURTIN."

At one o'clock on Friday Governor Curtin and staff left Harrisburg for the State border, there to receive the remains of the murdered President. He was accompanied by Maj.-Gen. George Cadwallader and Maj.-Gen. Heintzelman. The funeral train reached the west bank of the Susquehanna at half-past eight o'clock on Friday evening, and its arrival was announced by the report of a cannon from Capitol Hill. This was immediately followed by the ringing of bells, and the people began to flock to the court-house. An immense assembly soon collected at this point, and at the railroad depot there was another great gathering of people. As soon as the train stopped the pallbearers, in connection with the officers charged with the duty of guarding the body from Washington to Springfield, took charge of the coffin and deposited it on the hearse which had been specially constructed for the occasion. It was drawn by four white horses led by sergeants acting as grooms. The body was escorted to the capitol by a procession headed by Col. Henry McCormick, chief marshal, with Cols. H. C. Alleman, E. C. Williams, and W. W. Jennings, and Maj. David McCormick as aids. Then came the clergy of Harrisburg, and then the hearse. Following the latter came a number of leading citizens, including Mayor Roumfort, and then the Governor and his staff. These were followed by the State authorities, including members of the Legislature, judges of the courts, members of the bar, Common Council of Harrisburg, Committee of Arrangements, delegations from abroad, soldiers of the war of 1812, honorably discharged soldiers of the civil war, fire department, civic associations, secret societies, etc. There was also a military escort of artillery and cavalry, and the Sixteenth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, under the command of Col. T. S. Mather. The route of the procession was illuminated by means of chemical lights. When the head of the line reached the west gate of the capitol, the cavalry and artillery in the escort drew up in open order, while the infantry and civic portion of the column proceeded to the capitol in charge of the hearse. There was an immense gathering of people on Capitol Hill, and notwithstanding the storm which prevailed during the night, the greater portion of the mass of human beings that awaited the arrival of the remains was composed of ladies. At half past nine o'clock the corpse was placed on the catafalque erected for its reception immediately in front of the clerk's desk in the House of Representatives. As soon as the lid of the coffin had been removed, the doors for ingress and the windows for egress were opened, and the throng began to pour in.

All the trains which arrived at Harrisburg Friday night and Saturday morning were crowded with people from every portion of the State anxious to obtain a view of the remains. On Saturday morning a wreath and cross of flowers from the ladies of Harrisburg were placed on the coffin. At ten o'clock the doors of the rotunda were closed, and soon after the funeral procession moved to the depot, where the remains were placed on the train for Philadelphia.

And thus the war closed, save when the troops returned to their homes, but the gladness of the welcoming was saddened by the memories of a martyred President.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The War for the Union (continued)—Officers from Dauphin County in other Pennsylvania Regiments—Dauphin County in the Three Months' Service—The First, Second, Tenth, Fifteenth, and Twenty-fifth Regiments.

[FOR the rolls herewith given and the major portion of the history connected therewith, we are indebted to the "History of the Pennsylvania Volunteers, 1861-65," published by the State. As these rolls and accounts contain so many inaccuracies we were in hopes of having the record of each organization carefully revised. In several instances this has been done by the survivors of the organization. In others where it has been just as important we have failed to secure the desired aid. The present was an opportunity to have all errors corrected, but those familiar therewith who have neglected to take any interest in this matter are alone responsible for perpetuating blunders of fact or opinion.]

FIRST REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

On the 20th of April the First Pennsylvania Regiment of volunteer militia for the service of the national government was organized. Previous to the receipt of marching orders the men were furnished with muskets and muslin haversacks, and provided with hard-tack and bacon and about twelve round of ball-cartridge, which, for want of cartridge-boxes, were carried in their pockets. On the night of the 20th of April the regiment, under the command of Brig.-Gen. George C. Wynkoop, left Harrisburg and proceeded to a point near Cockeysville, on the Northern Central Railroad. This movement was made with the design of protecting the bridges on this road and eventually of opening communication with Washington, which, since the passage of the Massachusetts troops, had been broken. But, upon the representation of leading public men of Maryland that a military occupation and a resort to violent measures at this time might precipitate a collision and lead to the secession of the State, the authorities ordered a retrograde movement, and on the following Monday evening the command retired to Camp Scott, near the town of York. The regiment remained there, drilling in anticipation of immediate service in the field, until the 14th of May, when it was detailed to guard the Northern Central Railroad from the Pennsylvania line to Druid Park, near Baltimore.

On the 25th of May, having been relieved by the Twelfth Pennsylvania Regiment, Col. Campbell, it was ordered to move to Catonsville, Maryland, to guard the roads leading to Frederick City and Harper's Ferry. Tents and camp equipage were here supplied, which had hitherto been wanting, all efforts to obtain them having proved fruitless. On the 29th it was ordered to advance about five miles to the village of Franklintown, where it was posted, and remained guarding the same avenues as before.

On the 3d of June the regiment was ordered to Chambersburg to join the forces there concentrating. It was placed in camp, remaining several days, engaged in drill and field discipline. It was assigned to the Second Brigade, Second Division of Gen. Patterson's army. The brigade was soon after ordered to Hagerstown, and advanced to and encamped near the village of Funkstown. While at this place upon one occasion the whole encampment was aroused at midnight in anticipation of the enemy and hurriedly marched to Williamsport, on the Potomac, which was reached at day-break. Remaining until the following evening, no enemy being discovered, it was ordered to return to camp, reaching it about midnight. The regiment was here supplied with new uniforms. Previous to this time the men had suffered for the want of adequate clothing, though the destitution had been greatly relieved by a partial supply sent by kind friends at Easton. A few days later, on the 21st of June, orders were received from the commanding general to prepare three days' cooked rations, and, taking transportation and ten days' rations, to move with all possible dispatch and occupy Frederick, Maryland. In obedience to this order the regiment struck tents the same evening, and on the 22d arrived at Frederick and reported to Governor Hicks. The regiment remained here about two weeks, constantly improving in field exercises and military discipline. It was next ordered to Martinsburg, Virginia. Returning through Boonsborough, it encamped the same night on Kennedy's farm, and on the following day arrived at Williamsport. Forging the Potomac, it advanced to Falling Waters. Next day, resuming the march, it arrived at Martinsburg, meeting the whole division commanded by Gen. Patterson.

When, on the 14th of July, the division under Gen. Patterson moved towards Bunker Hill, the First Regiment, in obedience to this order, remained at Martinsburg, which had now become the base of supply. Two days later the regiment was ordered to Charlestown, where it again met and rejoined the division. Here, on the 17th of July, an order was received to have the men prepared with ten days' cooked rations in haversacks, and be ready to move without baggage. On this day it had been arranged that a battle should be fought by the army under McDowell, but was delayed till four days later.

The plan of campaign, as disclosed by the orders of the general-in-chief, contemplated that the army under Patterson should keep in front of the enemy and prevent his advance into Maryland or Pennsylvania, and make demonstrations in favor of the army operating under McDowell in front of Washington, with a conditional purpose of striking the enemy a damaging blow, if a favorable opportunity offered. These demonstrations were continued till it was supposed that the contemplated battle before Washington had been fought. Gen. Scott had given notice to Gen. Patterson that the movement would commence on the 16th, again that it had been commenced on the 17th, and finally that the decisive battle would be fought on the 18th. On the 21st, the regiment was ordered to move to Harper's Ferry, from whence, on the 23d, it marched to Sandy Hook, and on the same evening took the train for Harrisburg, where the men were honorably discharged and mustered out.

During the time that the regiment was in service, it did not participate in any battles; but its timely arrival in the field accomplished much good by checking any rash movement on the part of rebels in arms along our borders. The duties it was called upon to perform were faithfully done, and its good conduct, under all circumstances, was appreciated and acknowledged by its superior officers.

SECOND REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

The Second Regiment was formed from companies hastily recruited in obedience to the call for volunteers. Recruiting commenced on the 15th of April, 1861, and as fast as companies and squads were accepted they reported at Camp Curtin, Harrisburg. On the 21st of April, the officers of ten companies were ordered to hold an election at York for field officers of a regiment, at which the following were chosen and duly commissioned: Frederick S. Stumbaugh, of Chambersburg, colonel; Thomas Welsh, of Columbia, lieutenant-colonel; James Given, from captain of Company G, of West Chester, major. Isaac S. Waterbury was appointed adjutant.

On the evening of Saturday, April 20th, the same day on which the regiment was organized, it left Harrisburg by rail for Washington, but halted at Cockeysville, Md., at daylight on Sunday morning, the railroad bridge at that point having been destroyed. After remaining in bivouac and under arms for about forty-eight hours, the regiment was ordered back to York, Pa., where it remained in camp of instruction till the first day of June, when the command was ordered to Chambersburg. In the army organization which here ensued, the Second Regiment was assigned to the Second Brigade of the Second Division.

Gen. Robert Patterson had been assigned by Governor Curtin on the 16th of April to the command of Pennsylvania troops, and a few days thereafter, while busily engaged in organizing and sending them forward to points threatened, he was, by the order of Lieut.-Gen. Scott, placed in command of the "Department of Washington," embracing the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, with headquarters at Philadelphia. The quota of Pennsylvania troops, with an excess of some ten regiments, having been organized and placed in the field, and all the lines of communication leading to Washington having been opened and securely guarded, Gen. Patterson proceeded, on the 2d of June, to Chambersburg, where a camp had been formed under Maj.-Gen. William H. Keim, and assumed command, with the design of operating against the rebel army in the Shenandoah Valley, which was now threatening the contiguous parts of Maryland and Pennsylvania.

As early as the 20th of June, Gen. Scott had requested Gen. Patterson to propose to him a plan of operations. On the 21st the latter submitted one, which in substance proposed to occupy Maryland Heights with a brigade, and to fortify and arm with heavy artillery; to make Frederick, Md., the base of supply, with a guard which should act as a sustaining force to the command on Maryland Heights; to send all other available force, horse, foot, and artillery, across the Potomac to unite with Col. Stone at Leesburg, to operate from that point as circumstances should demand. This plan was not approved by Gen. Scott, and on the 25th of June he gave peremptory orders to Gen. Patterson to keep in front of the enemy while he remained in force between Winchester and the Potomac. The army having been ordered to move to Williamsport, the Second Regiment broke camp at Chambersburg on the 16th of June, and moving by rail to Hagerstown, went into camp at the village of Funkstown. Remaining here until the 23d, it was ordered forward towards the Potomac and encamped about four miles from the river. Crossing the Potomac with Gen. Patterson's combined army on the 2d of July, it advanced to Martinsburg. The enemy, having been pushed back from point to point, had finally established himself in an intrenched camp at Winchester. On the 15th of July, leaving two regiments at Martinsburg to guard his supplies, Gen. Patterson marched with the remainder of his force to Bunker Hill, driving Johnston's advanced guard from the place, and on the 16th of July, the day on which, according to the telegrams of Gen. Scott, Beauregard was to be attacked at Manassas, he made a demonstration in force, driving the enemy's pickets in upon his main line. On the 17th of June, Gen. Patterson transferred his whole command by a rapid movement to Charlestown. The term of service of the Second Regiment having already expired, it moved on the 23d of July from Charlestown, and marching to Harper's Ferry, was taken by rail to Harrisburg, where, on the 26th of July, it was mustered out of service.

FIFTEENTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

The "Verbeke Rifles," constituting Company E of the Fifteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, was emphatically a Harrisburg company, and although the third in the field from the city of Harrisburg, is claimed as the first volunteer organization of the county raised under the President's first call for troops to put down the Rebellion. The Cameron Guards and the State Guards were both militia organizations, and were recruited to their maximum number after the President's first proclamation for volunteers was issued, and they formed constituent parts of the First and Second Regiments of Pennsylvania Volunteers. The patriotism of William F. Verbeke, Esq., of Harrisburg, was fired by the treasonable attack of the rebels on Fort Sumter, and promptly, on the call of the government for volunteers to defend her honor, Mr. Verbeke was foremost in the good work at Harrisburg in recruiting men for the military service. He was untiring in his energy, and lavish in the expenditure of his money in raising troops for the government. He quartered and fed the recruits at his own expense, and threw wide open the doors of his private residence to soldiers generally, generously feeding the hungry, lodging the weary, and nursing the sick. The compliment of naming the company in his honor and giving him the nomination of its officers was most worthily bestowed upon a true patriot, a generous-hearted and most exemplary citizen. The nominations of John Nevin for captain, H. C. Alleman for first lieutenant, and Henry Lyne for second lieutenant were unanimously ratified by the company. The company marched into Camp Curtin on the 30th of April, and were at once mustered into the United States service by Capt. Seneca G. Simmons, U.S.A., for the period of three months. The Verbeke Rifles completed the organization of the regiment, and its colonel, R. A. Oakford, was placed in command of Camp Curtin, and Lieut. Alleman was made post-adjutant. The regiment was ordered to Lancaster, Pa., and on the 13th of May encamped on the Fair Grounds near that city, where they were formed into a brigade under Gen. James S. Negley. Here they drilled until the 3d of June, when they embarked for Chambersburg, going into camp about six miles beyond that town, where they remained one week, and then marched to Hagerstown, Md., where they formed a part of the Second Division, under Maj.-Gen. Keim. Near this town they encamped a few days, and then marched to the Potomac River, near Williamsport, on the famous battle-field of Antietam, where some of them afterwards fell in that sanguinary struggle. On the 1st of July they forded the Potomac River at Williamsport, under Maj.-Gen. Patterson, and constituted a portion of the reserve at the battle of Falling Waters. They occupied Martinsburg on the following day, and celebrated the 4th of July by placing the "stars and stripes" on the Berkeley County court-house. Halting here a few days while armed recognizances were constantly thrown out to feel the whereabouts and strength of the enemy, a march to Bunker Hill was made, driving in the pickets of the rebel general, Joseph E. Johnston, who was found strongly fortified at Winchester, as was demonstrated by our recognizance. After a rest here of two days the army made a demonstration against Johnston's lines and then directed to the left, occupying Charlestown on the 12th of July, where they remained until the following Sunday, when they marched homewards and occupied Harper's Ferry, hearing distinctly the booming of the distant cannon at the battle of Bull Run. Remaining one week at Harper's Ferry, the regiment marched back to Hagerstown, and were mustered out of service at Carlisle on the following 8th of August, when they were paid off in gold. This company lost three of its men by death. Lieut. Lyne resigned just previous to the regiment crossing the Potomac, and was succeeded by First Sergt. Samuel Wolfe, who was afterwards, as a lieutenant of the Forty-sixth Regiment, killed at the head of his command. During the last two months of their term of service Capt. Nevin and Lieut. Alleman acted upon a general court-martial in conjunction with their company duties, Lieut. Alleman being the judge-advocate of the court. With scarcely an exception all of the survivors of this company returned to the field, and while many of them became distinguished for gallantry, nearly all of them were promoted during the war to the grades of line-officers, while some of them reached the highest rank of field-officers. The Verbeke Rifles did their full duty, and its members acquitted themselves in subsequent organizations with credit to themselves, and honor to the good old county of Dauphin.

FORTY-SIXTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

Company D of this regiment, recruited in Dauphin County, had been in the three months' service. The other companies, as a general thing, served in the first campaign, and were recruited in Allegheny, Berks, Potter, Luzerne, and Northumberland Counties.

Rendezvousing at Camp Curtin, the regiment was organized on the 1st of September, 1861, by the selection of the following field-officers: Joseph F. Knipe, of Dauphin County, who had served during the three months' campaign on the staff of Gen. E. C. Williams, colonel; James L. Selfridge, from captain of Company

C, lieutenant-colonel; Arnold C. Lewis, major. On the 22d of September, Maj. Lewis, while attempting to enforce discipline in a case of insubordination, was shot and instantly killed by a private of Company I, who afterwards suffered the extreme penalty of the law for his offense. Capt. J. A. Matthews, of Company A, was promoted to major.

Upon the resignation of Gen. Patterson from the command of the Army of the Shenandoah, Gen. Banks was appointed to succeed him. His forces were posted on the Upper Potomac, along the Maryland shore, in the neighborhood of Harper's Ferry. Soon after its organization, the Forty-sixth was ordered to Gen. Banks' command. Upon its arrival it was assigned to the First Brigade (under Gen. S. W. Crawford) of the Second Division of his corps. Little of interest, save the usual drill and camp duty and an occasional skirmish with the enemy, occurred until the opening of the spring campaign. In January, 1862, Stonewall Jackson, with a well-appointed force of all arms, having for some time occupied the Shenandoah Valley, had pushed out as far west as Hancock, where he was met and driven back by Gen. Lander. Lander pursued but soon after died, and was succeeded in command by Gen. Shields, who continued the pursuit to Winchester. On the 24th of February, Gen. Banks commenced crossing the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, and occupied, in turn, Leesburg; Charlestown, Martinsburg, and Winchester. Shields continued the pursuit of Jackson as far as New Market, whence he returned to Winchester. In the mean time Banks had dispatched one division of his corps to Centreville, and had himself departed for Washington. Considering himself superior to the Union force remaining, Jackson turned upon Shields, and a severe engagement ensued in the neighborhood of Kernstown. Three companies of the Forty-sixth, under command of Maj. Matthews, arrived upon the field in time to participate in the conflict. Jackson was beaten, and Banks returning gave chase, which was continued to Woodstock. In this pursuit the Forty-sixth was conspicuous, Col. Knipe manifesting his usual enterprise and daring.

Jackson, who was fearful of a union of the forces of Fremont and Banks, marched hastily across the mountain to McDowell, where he encountered the head of Fremont's column, under Milroy and Schenck, and defeated it, inflicting considerable loss. Returning with his characteristic celerity of movement, and masking his progress by his cavalry, he fell suddenly upon Col. Kenley, occupying an outpost at Front Royal, and, routing his small force, was making for the rear of Banks' army, before the latter was aware of an enemy's presence in his front. Turning his trains towards the Potomac, and dispersing the rebel cavalry which appeared upon his rear, Banks commenced his retreat down the valley. Finding that he must make a stand to save his trains, he drew up his little army in line of battle in front of Winchester, and with an entire force of only about seven thousand men prepared to meet Jackson with not less than twenty thousand. For five hours the unequal contest was maintained, the Forty-sixth holding its ground with unexampled coolness and bravery. At length, finding himself outflanked and likely to be overpowered, he withdrew and made his way to the Potomac, where his trains had already arrived and crossed in safety. In this engagement the Forty-sixth lost four killed, ten wounded, and three taken prisoners. The loss to the Union force in withdrawing through the streets of the town was considerable, the inhabitants, both male and female, vying with each other in pouring forth insults and deadly missiles. "My retreating column," says Gen. Banks in his official report, "suffered serious loss in the streets of Winchester, males and females vied with each other in increasing the number of their victims by firing from the houses, throwing hand grenades, hot water, and missiles of every description."

Upon the appointment of Gen. Pope to the command of the Army of Northern Virginia, the scattered forces upon the Rappahannock, the Shenandoah, and in West Virginia were concentrated and were organized in three corps, commanded respectively by Sigel (formerly Fremont), Banks, and McDowell. On the 7th of August, 1862, Crawford's brigade was stationed at Culpeper Court-House. The divisions of Ewell and Stonewall Jackson, followed by that of Hill, a force twenty-five thousand strong, had already arrived upon the Rapidan, and had commenced crossing, driving back the Union cavalry. On the 8th, Crawford was ordered forward towards Cedar Mountain, and on the following morning Banks followed with the rest of his corps, consisting of seven thousand men. Jackson, having pushed forward his columns with celerity, had taken position with his artillery on Cedar Mountain, at an elevation of two hundred feet above the surrounding plain, but had kept his infantry masked under the shadow of the forests. Four guns had been advanced farther to the front and lower down the side of the mountain. These, with the more elevated ones, opened on Crawford's brigade, and at five o'clock P.M. the Union forces in two columns advanced to the attack. The position of the Forty-sixth fell opposite the enemy's advanced pieces, and upon these the men charged with desperate valor. But before reaching them they had to pass an open field, now covered with shocks of full-ripened wheat. Here they were fearfully exposed, and the enemy's artillery, and his strong lines of infantry concealed from view, poured in a merciless storm of shot and shell. Three times was it led to the charge across that fatal plain, when Col. Knipe fell severely wounded, and the regiment was withdrawn. "Had victory been possible," says Greeley, "they would have won it. . . . The best blood of the Union was poured out like water. . . . Gen. Crawford's brigade came out of the fight a mere skeleton." The loss in the Forty-sixth was thirty killed, thirty-four severely wounded, and six prisoners. Among the killed were Lieuts. Robert Wilson, S. H. Jones, and William P. Caldwell, and among the wounded Col. Knipe, Maj. Matthews, Capts. Lukenbaugh, Brooks, and Foulke, and Lieuts. Selheimer, Caldwell, Craig, and Matthews.

In the battle of Antietam, Banks' corps was commanded by Gen. Mansfield, and early in the day of September 17th was led to the support of Hooker, battling with a heavy force of the enemy on the extreme right of the line, across Antietam Creek. Crawford's brigade was sent to the support of Ricketts' division, and advanced carrying the woods to the right of and beyond the cornfield, and maintained its position until relieved by Sedgwick's division of Sumner's corps. The Forty-sixth was here led by Col. Knipe, although suffering from the effects of his wounds. The loss was six killed and three severely wounded. Capt. George A. Brooks, of Harrisburg, was among the killed. Soon after the battle of Antietam, Col. Knipe was promoted to brigadier-general, and assigned to the command of the brigade; Lieut.-Col. Selfridge was promoted to colonel; Maj. Matthews to colonel of the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, which was assigned to Knipe's brigade; Capt. William L. Foulke, of Company B, to lieutenant-colonel, and Capt. Cyrus Strouse, of Company K, to major. Upon the inauguration of the Fredericksburg campaign, the Forty-sixth, which was then lying with the division at Fairfax, was ordered forward, but did not arrive upon the field in time to be engaged.

In the reorganization of the army, which was made upon the accession of Gen. Joseph Hooker to the chief command, Knipe's brigade became the Second of the First Division of the Twelfth Corps, the division being commanded by Gen. A. S. Williams, and the corps by Gen. Slocum.

On the 27th of April, 1863, the Eleventh and Twelfth Corps, which had been lying near Falmouth during the winter, marched north to Kelly's Ford, where they crossed the Rappahannock, thence to Germania Ford, where they crossed the Rapidan, and arrived at Chancellorsville without encountering serious opposition. Here it was joined by the Fifth Corps, and on the 30th by the Third Corps. There were three roads centring at Chancellorsville, the main direction of each being eastward. Upon each of these Hooker ordered an advance on the morning of the 1st of May, Meade upon the left, Sykes commanding a division of regulars belonging to the Fifth Corps in the centre, and Howard upon the right. At two o'clock P.M., the movement commenced, and after proceeding some three miles the central column encountered the enemy in considerable force, and Knipe's brigade was sent to its support, where it was engaged, and lost some men; whereupon Hooker ordered a retrograde movement and a concentration upon the line of the previous night with the Chancellor House as headquarters, Meade on the left, Slocum in the centre, and Howard somewhat in the air on the right. Desultory fighting continued during the day of the 2d of May, when, at near nightfall, Stonewall Jackson, with twenty-five thousand men, burst like an avalanche upon Howard's corps, resting unsuspecting of danger, and drove it in rout and confusion upon the centre. This brought the enemy upon Slocum's right, and during the early part of the night a sharp conflict was kept up, wherein Knipe's brigade was engaged, losing many in killed and wounded, and a considerable number of prisoners. Here fell Maj. Strouse, his body riddled with bullets, while attempting to escape when called on to surrender. At midnight a countercharge was made by Birney's division, and a part of the guns lost by Howard, and his abandoned rifle-pits, were regained, and the enemy thrown into some confusion. On the morning of the 3d, Williams' brigade was sent to the support of Birney, and here the battle raged with great fury, the enemy losing heavily, and being broken and driven in great confusion. Upon the return of Hooker to the north bank of the Rappahannock the regiment occupied its old camp, where it remained until the advance of the army into Pennsylvania. The loss in the Chancellorsville campaign was four killed, a considerable number wounded, two severely, and two taken prisoners. Maj. Strouse and Lieut. O. R. Priestly were among the killed.

Early in June, Lee commenced a movement north, marching down the Shenandoah Valley, and crossing the Potomac at Williamsport. On the 1st of July he met the Union army at Gettysburg. On the evening of the same day the Twelfth Corps arrived upon the field, and was posted on the right of the line holding the summits of Culp's Hill, where a formidable breastwork was thrown up. On the afternoon of the 2d the First and Second Divisions were ordered to the support of the left, leaving their works unoccupied, save by a thin line of Green's brigade, of the Second Division. During their absence the enemy attacked and carried the left of the works, and, upon their return at evening, they found the rebels in possession. Dispositions were promptly made to retake them. Before dawn of the 3d a heavy fire of infantry and artillery was opened upon the enemy, and after an obstinate resistance of several hours he was driven back at the point of the bayonet. The Forty-sixth held the extreme right of the line, and after the reoccupation of the breastworks, was pushed across an open space beyond Spangler's Spring, and held a piece of wood fringing Rock Creek. The loss, owing to the sheltered position which the regiment occupied, was inconsiderable.

Upon the withdrawal of Lee into Virginia, the Union army followed up his line of retreat, at the same time covering Washington until it reached the Rapidan. Here the Eleventh and Twelfth Corps were detached from the Army of the Potomac and ordered to the support of Rosecrans in Tennessee and Northern Georgia. Marching to Washington, the regiment proceeded by rail to Nashville. Here the First Division was detailed to guard the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad from Tullahoma to Bridgeport. The country through which the road passes was infested with guerrillas and rebel cavalry, ever watchful for an opportunity to destroy the road and to wreck the trains. It was vital to the existence of the army that this line should be kept open and that it should be operated to its utmost capacity. The vigilance and fidelity with which this service was performed on the part of the Forty-sixth elicited the warm approval of its superior officers.

Early in January, 1864, a large proportion of the officers and men of the regiment having re-enlisted for a second term of three years, insuring its continuance as an organization, they were given a veteran furlough and proceeded to Pennsylvania.¹ Here its ranks were rapidly recruited, and upon its return the division rejoined the corps in winter-quarters in and about Chattanooga.

On the 6th of May Sherman's army, seventy thousand strong, with one hundred and fifty guns, broke up winter-quarters and moved on the ever memorable Atlanta campaign. At Dalton, where Johnston, who commanded the rebel army, was first met, the enemy was turned out of a position strong by nature and well fortified by a flank movement through Snake Creek Gap, which had already been captured by Geary's division.

Following up the retreating enemy, Sherman found him well entrenched at Resaca, prepared to dispute his further progress. Here Sherman again attempted a movement by the right flank; but Johnston, taking advantage of his antagonist's weakened lines in front, delivered a heavy and well-sustained attack, falling upon the divisions of Hooker and Schofield. He found Hooker not unprepared for the encounter, and after a bloody conflict Johnston was driven, with a loss of four guns and many prisoners. In this engagement the Forty-sixth participated, losing three killed and five wounded.

Pushing the enemy steadily back, on the 25th of May the regiment was again engaged at Pumpkinvine Creek and at New Hope Church. The country is

Henry Weidensaul, named above, was first sergeant of Capt. Brooks' company. He was first wounded at Cedar Mountain in August, 1862, where he was taken prisoner and was confined in Libby Prison for nearly five weeks. He was again wounded at Atlanta.

here broken and the enemy was well entrenched, his lines stretching across Lost, Pine, and Kenesaw Mountains, from Dallas to Marietta, presenting an unbroken front. From the 25th of May until near the middle of June, Sherman, always fruitful in resources, operated against the enemy's lines, compelling him, by constant battering and picket firing and by frequent assaults gradually to give ground, taking first Pine Knob, then Lost Mountain, and at length the long line of breastworks connecting the latter with Kenesaw. Finally, on the 22d of June, the enemy, finding himself slowly but surely pushed from his strong position, suddenly assumed the offensive and made a furious attack upon Hooker's corps, in position near the Culp House. It fell principally upon Knipe's brigade and was led by Hood, but signally failed. Hood was repulsed with heavy loss, including some prisoners. "Williams' division," says Gen. Thomas in his official report, "skirmished itself into position on the right of Geary's division, the right of Williams resting at Culp's house, on the Powder Spring and Marietta road. About 4 P.M. the enemy in heavy force attacked Knipe's brigade in its advanced position before his men had time to throw up any works, and persisted in the assault until sundown, when they withdrew, their ranks hopelessly broken, each assault having been repelled with heavy loss." In the various engagements at Dallas, Pine Knob, Kenesaw Mountain, and Marietta, in all of which the Forty-sixth participated, the loss was fourteen killed and about thirty wounded. Capt. D. H. Chesebro and Lieut. J. W. Phillips were among the killed.

On the 16th of July Sherman crossed the Chattahoochee River, and sweeping around to the left, began closing in upon Atlanta, McPherson reaching out to strike the Augusta Railroad. While these movements were in full progress and the army only partially across Peach Tree Creek, a considerable stream running in a westerly direction in front of Atlanta, Hood again attacked, leading a heavy force and precipitating it with great violence upon the Union columns, falling principally upon Newton's and upon Hooker's corps. The Forty-sixth was much exposed and suffered severely; but with ranks undismayed, led by Col. Selfridge, who was in the thickest of the fight, conspicuous by his white, flowing locks, encouraging and steadying his men, they hurled back the rebel hordes at the point of the bayonet. With columns sadly decimated, Hood retreated from the field, leaving five hundred dead, one thousand severely wounded, and many prisoners in the hands of the victors. The loss in the regiment was ten killed and twenty-two wounded. Capt. S. T. Ketrer, Lieuts. H. J. Davis, Samuel Wolf, and David C. Selheimer, and Adj. Luther R. Whitman were among the killed.

off the railroads and invest the city on the south, when Hood, detecting the movement, again fell upon the Union lines only partially formed. The attack was made with the rebel leader's characteristic impetuosity, but it fell like the beating of the mad waves of the sea against the immovable cliff. The regiment lost here six killed and a considerable number wounded.

On the 1st of September Atlanta surrendered and Sherman's victorious columns entered the city in triumph. The hard fighting of the regiment was now ended. Gen. Knipe was here transferred to the command of cavalry and Col. Selfridge to the brigade, leaving Major Patrick Griffith in command of the regiment. On the 11th of November Sherman commenced his march to the sea. On the 21st of December he reached Savannah, and after a brief conflict at Fort McAllister took possession of the city. With but a brief respite he faced his columns to the north, and on the 17th of February Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, was taken without resistance, and a month later he reached Goldsborough, the end of his hostile wayfaring. Johnston surrendered on the 26th of April, and the army immediately commenced its homeward march. On the 16th of July, 1865, the Forty-sixth Regiment, after nearly four years of faithful service, was mustered out near Alexandria, Va.

FIFTY-FOURTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

This regiment, recruited principally in the counties of Cambria, Somerset, Dauphin, Northampton, and Lehigh, in 1861, rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, and was organized by the selection of the following field-officers: Jacob M. Campbell, of Cambria County, colonel; Barnabas McDermit, of Cambria County, lieutenant-colonel; John P. Linton, of Cambria County, major. Col. Campbell and many of the officers and men had served during the three months' campaign, and Lieut.-Col. McDermit possessed military experience acquired in the Mexican war. The men were drilled by squads and companies while in camp, and Company F, Capt. Davis, for some time performed guard duty at the State arsenal. On the 27th of February, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Washington, and upon its arrival went into camp near Bladensburg Cemetery. Here the altered flint-lock muskets furnished by the State were exchanged for the Belgian rifles. On the 29th of March the regiment was ordered to proceed to Harper's Ferry, and report to Col. Miles. Upon his arrival Col. Campbell was directed to make a disposition of his force along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and Company F, Capt. G. W. P. Davis, was stationed at Sleepy Creek Bridge, seventeen miles west of Martinsburg. The country through which that portion of the railroad runs, which the regiment was required to guard, was considered by the rebels as their own territory, and the majority of the population in the vicinity was rebel at heart. Numerous guerrilla bands, led by daring and reckless chieftains, roved the country, pillaging and burning the property of Union inhabitants, and watchful for an opportunity to burn the railroad bridges, cut the wires of the telegraph, and destroy the road. To guard this great thoroughfare, of vital importance to the government, to suppress guerrilla warfare, to afford protection to the harassed and helpless people, was the duty which the regiment was assigned to perform. Col. Campbell at once assumed the offensive, and hunted them instead of waiting to let them hunt him. Almost daily, from some part of the line, squads were sent out to engage and capture the following roving bands led by such partisans as Edwards, White, Imboden, and McNeil, and many were brought in.

On Sunday morning, the 25th of May, 1862, all the locomotives on the railroad west of Harper's Ferry were hurried through to Cumberland, the engineers bringing the first intelligence of the retreat of Banks and the approach of Stonewall Jackson to Martinsburg. At nine o'clock that night Col. Campbell received the following dispatch from Col. Miles: "Concentrate your regiment at South Branch. Gen. Banks defeated and driven through Martinsburg. Expect an attack here hourly. Mean to fight." The success of Jackson, and the consequent withdrawal from the road, had inspired the roving bands with new life, and they became more troublesome than ever, wandering up and down the country, pillaging indiscriminately from friend and foe. The several companies were kept constantly on the alert, and with an energy and enterprise rarely equaled, the territory was scoured, many of the squads penetrating the interior twenty and thirty miles, capturing and dispersing the guerrillas, restoring stolen property, and successfully protecting and preserving the road.

The rebel army having defeated McClellan upon the Peninsula, and Pope at Bull Run, was now advancing into Maryland on the Antietam campaign. On the 11th of September his advance guard reached Back Creek. Communication with Col. Miles was severed, and soon after Harper's Ferry was invested by Jackson, the post, garrison, and immense military stores falling into the hands of the enemy. Col. Campbell telegraphed to Gen. Kelly, in command in West Virginia, for orders. Kelly declined to give any, but advised the withdrawal from the road. This the colonel decided not to follow and clung to his position, which had now become perilous, his little band of nine hundred men, without artillery or cavalry, being the only Union forces at that time in the hostile territory of Virginia.

After the battle of Antietam, Gen. McClellan, unaware of the presence of any Union troops south of the Potomac, sent a cavalry force to picket the Maryland shore. Seeing soldiers in blue across the river they regarded Col. Campbell's men as rebels in disguise, and it was with difficulty that they could be undeceived. Upon the surrender of Miles the brigade to which the regiment belonged had disappeared. A report to the general-in-chief soon brought an order attaching it to Gen. Franklin's command.

Soon afterwards the regiment was attached to the command of Gen. Morrell, left for the defense of the Upper Potomac, and subsequently, upon the organization of the Eighth Army Corps, it was assigned to the Third Brigade of the Second Division, commanded by Gen. Kelly. On the 29th of January, 1863, the Fifty-fourth was attached to the Fourth Brigade of the First Division, department of West Virginia, Col. Campbell in command of the brigade, and Lieut.-Col. Linton of the regiment. On the 3d of April, the enemy having attacked a forage train above Burlington, the Fifty-fourth, with a battalion of cavalry, was sent in pursuit. At Purgitsville the rebel cavalry was encountered and driven, and some prisoners taken. The regiment continued here, scouting the country and capturing guerrillas who infested the region, until the 30th of June, when it moved to New Creek in anticipation of an attack upon Grafton. On the 6th of July, Gen. Kelly moved his command, by forced marches, to co-operate with the Army of the Potomac, now driving the enemy from the field of Gettysburg. On the 10th he came upon the rebel pickets, and upon the withdrawal of the rebel army into Virginia he followed up the retreat, and on the 19th was heavily engaged. During the night he learned through a scout that the enemy in force was moving on his rear and immediately retreated into Maryland, leaving the Fifty-fourth alone upon the Virginia shore. The enemy approached and threw a few shells into its lines, but soon retired. On the 6th of November the brigade moved to Springfield, where a reorganization of the command took place, the Fifty-fourth being assigned to the First Brigade of the Second Division, Col. Campbell in command.

On the 4th of January, 1864, Gen. Kelly apprehending an attack upon Cumberland, Col. Campbell, with part of his command, was ordered to its defense. A month later Company F, while guarding the railroad bridge at Patterson's Creek, was attacked by a party of the enemy under the notorious Harry Gilmor in the garb of Union soldiers. By this deception the rebels reached the picket line unsuspected, when they dashed into the camp, and after a short struggle compelled its surrender. Three of the company were killed and several wounded. After the surrender, Gilmor, with his own hand, shot and instantly killed Corporal Gibbs, an act which should stamp its perpetrator with infamy. Col. Campbell, at his own request, was relieved from the command of his brigade and assumed charge of his regiment.

About this time Gen. Sigel relieved Gen. Kelly, and immediately commenced preparations for a campaign in the Shenandoah Valley. On the 15th of May, while pushing his columns up the valley, Sigel struck a force of the enemy, unexpectedly large, under Gen. Breckinridge, near New Market, prepared to offer battle. Confident of his ability to drive the opposing force, Sigel disposed his troops for battle. At the opening of the battle, the cavalry in passing to the rear threw the infantry into some confusion, breaking through its lines. Steadily the enemy moved forward to the attack, his long lines overlapping both flanks of Sigel's force. The artillery was plied with excellent effect, but could not stay the rebel columns. Arriving within easy musket range, the infantry of both sides opened simultaneously a heavy and mutually destructive fire. For some time the battle raged with great fury, but the enemy's superiority of numbers at length prevailed, and the Union lines were forced back, the Fifty-fourth retiring in good order, returning the fire of the enemy until he ceased to pursue. Sigel retreated to Cedar Creek, where he threw up defensive works. The loss of the regiment in this engagement was one hundred and seventy-four killed, wounded, and missing.

During the remaining summer months the regiment participated in the marches and counter-marches of the command, the exact object of which was probably best known to its leader. Upon the assumption of the chief command by Gen. Sheridan, the army was reorganized and prepared for an active campaign. The Fifty-fourth marched with the command to Cedar Creek, participating in a series of heavy skirmishes, and with it fell back to Halltown. Here it remained until August 28th, when the enemy having disappeared from its front the whole force marched to Charlestown, and on the 3d of September to Berryville. On the day of its arrival a severe engagement occurred, lasting far into the night and ending in the complete repulse of the enemy. For four days the Army of West Virginia, now known as the Eighth Corps, bivouacked near Berryville, and was then transferred from the extreme left of the infantry line to the extreme right, at Summit Point. Here the Fifty-fourth remained until the 19th, repairing, as far as possible, the ravages of the campaign, distributing supplies, and assigning recruits, convalescents, and veterans returned from furlough.

On the 19th of December the main body of Sheridan's army marched from the valley to join Grant in front of Petersburg. The Fifty-fourth moved to Washington and thence to City Point, arriving on the 23d, and encamped on Chapin's farm. It was assigned to duty in the Army of the James.

Upon the muster out of service of the Third and Fourth Reserve Regiments in May, 1864, the veterans and recruits were at first organized into an independent battalion, which was subsequently united to the Fifty-fourth. On the 7th of February, 1865, the term of original enlistments having expired, an order from the War Department directed that the two organizations should be consolidated under the name of the Fifty-fourth Regiment. This was effected, and it was assigned to the Second Brigade, Independent Division of the Army of the James, commanded by Gen. Ord.

On the morning of the 2d of April, the regiment was ordered to join in the general forward movement of the army, and proceeding with the brigade crossed the rebel works near the Boynton Plank Road, now abandoned, and approached Fort Gregg. Here a spirited resistance was offered, and it was not until a hot fire of infantry and artillery had been brought to bear upon the enemy that he yielded. In this brief engagement the regiment lost twenty killed and wounded.

The rebel army having been routed from its works about Petersburg, was retreating rapidly towards the North Carolina border. On the 5th of April two regiments, the Fifty-fourth Pennsylvania and the One Hundred and Twenty-third Ohio, Col. Kellogg, with two companies of the Fourth Massachusetts Cavalry, Col. Washburn, were ordered to make a forced march to High Bridge and effect its destruction for the purpose of cutting the enemy's way of retreat and delaying his columns. Arrived at Rice's Station, Gen. Read, of Ord's staff, took command, and when within sight of the bridge made his dispositions for the attack. Before the column could be formed, word was brought that the vedettes at Rice's had been driven; nothing daunted, the little force promptly attacked. But the enemy had taken ample precautions for the safety of this their main avenue of escape, and after a desperate struggle, in which Gen. Read was killed, Cols. Kellogg and Washburn wounded and taken prisoners, and a large proportion of the command killed or prisoners, surrounded on all sides by the main columns of the enemy's infantry and cavalry, it was forced to surrender. The loss of the Fifty-fourth was twenty-one killed and wounded. The captives were taken back to Rice's, where, to their astonishment, they beheld Longstreet's corps entrenched, having come up but a few moments after Read's column had passed in the morning.

The attack, though failing in its immediate purpose, subserved the main end; for Lee's columns were thereby delayed several hours, enabling Sheridan to sweep around the enemy's rear and complete the destruction and capture of that once proud and defiant army. For four days, without rations, the captives marched with the retreating rebel army, when to their great joy they were released from their captivity and their starving condition by Grant's victorious columns. From Appomattox Court-House the regiment was sent to Camp Parole, at Annapolis, Md., and on the 15th of July was mustered out of service at Harrisburg.

FIFTY-FIFTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

The Fifty-fifth Regiment was recruited, under authority granted by Governor Curtin to Col. Richard White, during the summer and autumn of 1861, of which Company G was raised in Dauphin County. The regiment rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, where an organization was effected by the choice of field-officers. Three of the companies, B, E, and G, were for a time stationed at Camp Cameron, near Harrisburg, under the command of Col. Thomas A. Zeigle, and were instructed by regular army officers.

On the 22d of November the regiment, thirty-eight officers and seven hundred and fifty-seven men, left Camp Curtin and proceeded to Fortress Monroe. Drill and discipline, which had been commenced at Camp Curtin, was here resumed, and the command was brought to a good degree of efficiency. On the 8th of December, in company with the Forty-fifth, Seventy-sixth, and Ninety-seventh Regiments, it embarked for South Carolina, arriving at Port Royal on the 12th. The Fifty-fifth was immediately sent out to guard the small islands and approaches to the west of Hilton Head, where it remained until the 25th of February, 1862, when it was transferred to Edisto Island. While on duty here a series of attacks were made by the enemy in large force upon the companies, scattered as they necessarily were in holding the Union outstretched lines upon the coast. The most determined of these was made on the 29th of March, when Companies E, F, and G, posted at the head of the island, nearly twelve miles from the headquarters of the regiment, were attacked by a force of the enemy estimated at two thousand. The action which ensued was severe, but the rebels were signally repulsed, with a loss to the three companies of about twenty killed and wounded. Gen. Evans, in command of the enemy, afterwards reported to the rebel government that he had made a reconnoissance upon Edisto Island, and had found the enemy six thousand strong.

During the summer the only troops upon the island were those of the Fifty-fifth, and the duty, performed beneath a Southern sun, was very severe. On the 21st of October the regiment accompanied Gen. Brannan on an expedition, consisting of about four thousand troops, up Broad River. The command landed, under cover of gunboats, at Mackey's Point, and immediately advanced on Pocotaligo Bridge, the object of the movement being to destroy the Charleston and Savannah Railroad. At eight o'clock on the morning of the 22d the enemy was met at Caston, but were soon driven. At Frampton he made another stand, and after a sharp engagement was again driven, and retreated across the Pocotaligo River, burning the bridge as he withdrew. Here he took a strong position, and being largely reinforced from Charleston, held his ground during six hours, in which the battle fiercely raged. Unable to gain an advantage, the ammunition being nearly exhausted, the Union forces withdrew under cover of night and returned to Hilton Head. The Fifty-fifth lost in this engagement twenty-nine killed and wounded. Near the close of the action, while bravely leading his men against a masked battery, Capt. Horace C. Bennett was killed.

The regiment was now stationed at Beaufort, S. C., where it remained for more than a year, performing picket duty at Port Royal Ferry, ten miles from the town, and also serving in the capacity of heavy artillery upon the fortifications.

On the 1st of January, 1864, the majority of the men re-enlisted for a second term of three years, and on the 22d departed for Harrisburg, where, upon their arrival, they were dismissed for a veteran furlough. On the 23d of March the veterans and recruits returned to South Carolina, where the regiment, now numbering twelve hundred and fifty effective men, remained for three weeks engaged in drill and guard duty. On the 12th of April it embarked for Virginia, and landed at Gloucester Point, opposite Yorktown. Here the regiment was assigned to the Third Brigade (Col. Richard White), Third Division, Tenth Corps, Army of the James.

Gen. Butler was here organizing his forces, consisting of about forty thousand men, to operate against Richmond by the right bank of the James. Embarking upon transports, the Tenth Corps moved up the river and landed at Bermuda Hundred, with the design of seizing and fortifying the peninsula between the Appomattox and the James as a base of operations. Advancing ten miles west, encountering little opposition, the troops were set to work throwing up intrenchments across the head of the peninsula, and soon had the neck of the "bottle" closed.

On the 9th of May, Ames' division moved out of the works and destroyed the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad for a distance of two miles. Gen.

Ames then marched upon the turnpike towards Petersburg as far as Swift Creek, where he met the enemy well posted, and immediately attacked, the contest continuing until evening. Early on the following morning Ames learned that Terry's division, in his rear, had been attacked. Facing his columns about and advancing, he soon encountered the rebel forces, and drove them as far as Drury's Bluff, near Richmond. On the 13th the Union forces were again pushed forward towards Richmond, but found the enemy strongly intrenched in a double line of works behind Proctor's Creek. The outer line was carried, and Gillmore's troops continued the contest during the 14th and 15th, flanking the rebel position. But he had now been reinforced by troops from Charleston, and Gen. Beauregard was in command. Seeing that the Union lines were greatly extended, and in many parts thereby greatly weakened, the rebel leader moved out of his intrenchments at night, and early on the morning of the 16th, under cover of a dense fog, fell upon the left flank with sudden and overpowering force. The Fifty-fifth occupied a position near the extreme left, and felt the full force of the enemy's blows. Again and again he advanced to the charge. Portions of the line gave way. The Fifty-fifth stood side by side with the Fourth New Hampshire and gallantly held its ground, until, out-flanked and nearly surrounded, it was in danger of being captured. Col. White, as a last resort, selected three companies, C, D, and E, of his own regiment, and charged full upon the head of the advancing column. But it could not be broken, and the line was forced to yield. The loss in this engagement was very severe, being in killed, wounded, and prisoners, including those from May 9th, when the fighting commenced, fifteen commissioned officers and three hundred enlisted men. The colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and adjutant were among the prisoners, and Lieut. John H. Barnhart was among the killed. The command of the regiment devolved upon Capt. John C. Shearer.

The army now fell back to its intrenched line at Bermuda Hundred, and the regiment was subsequently engaged in several minor skirmishes. On the morning of the 20th of May the enemy attacked the picket line on Forster's plantation at daylight. One-half of the Fifty-fifth was in position and made a stern resistance, holding its ground until the yielding of the forces on right and left made it necessary for it to fall back to save itself from capture.

Butler, having completed his preparations, was upon the point of moving upon the enemy's lines about Petersburg, when he received orders from Grant to detach a heavy force under Gen. "Baldy" Smith and send it to the support of the Army of the Potomac. The Fifty-fifth was one of the regiments selected for this purpose, and was assigned to the First Brigade (Gen. Stannard), Second Division (Gen. Martindale), Eighteenth Corps. Moving in transports down the James and up the York Rivers, the corps debarked at West Point, and marched via White House to Cold Harbor, where, on the 1st of June, it met the enemy, who was engaging the Sixth Corps. The line of battle was immediately formed and charged the enemy's works, capturing a line of rifle-pits and taking a large number of prisoners. The contest was continued during the 1st and 2d, but the principal charge was made on the morning of the 3d. Stannard's brigade was selected for the attack, and was formed in columns of regiments, in which the Fifty-fifth was the third. As it swept forward to the desperate work the intense fire of the enemy caused the front lines to waver, and finally to fall back in confusion upon the third, which was also momentarily deranged. Capt. Shearer, in command, was wounded, and scarcely had the next in rank, Capt. Nesbitt, assumed it when he also was stricken down, and it devolved upon Capt. Hill, who soon restored order and held his position, now in the front line. During the night breastworks were thrown up, which were occupied until the night of the 12th, when the entire army withdrew. The loss in killed and wounded was four commissioned officers and one hundred and thirty-four enlisted men. In conducting this withdrawal from the enemy's front the Fifty-fifth was deployed in the front line of works, while the regiments successively fell back in the stillness of the night until all had retired without casualties or disturbance.

Marching back to White House, the corps again embarked on transports, and moved, via the Pamunkey, York, and James Rivers, to Point of Rocks, on the Appomattox, where it debarked, and early on the morning of the 15th advanced on the enemy's works in front of Petersburg, capturing eighteen guns and four hundred prisoners. On the following morning Gen. Stannard ordered Capt. Hill to go forward with his regiment as skirmishers. He promptly advanced in the face of a hot fire and gained a position close up to the enemy's lines, but not without serious loss. On the 18th, Stannard's brigade, occupying the extreme right of the line, resting on the Appomattox, was again deployed for a charge. In front was an open field, commanded by the enemy's infantry and artillery, across which it must pass. Never faltering, the Fifty-fifth, which faced the ground most exposed, pushed forward obedient to command, and in less than ten minutes, while crossing this open field, it lost three commissioned officers and eighty enlisted men,—more than half of its effective strength,—a large proportion killed.

On the evening of the 29th the corps moved to the rear of the position held by the Ninth Corps, and upon the explosion of the mine, on the morning of the 30th, it was held in readiness to support the assaulting column; but the attack failed, and without being called into action, it returned to its old position on the Appomattox. For two months the regiment was engaged in duties incident to a siege, being constantly exposed to the fire of artillery, and the musketry of the pickets and sharpshooters, scarcely a day passing without some loss.

During the night of September 28th the regiment crossed the James, and marched to participate in the attack about to be made by the Army of the James upon Chapin's Bluff. The capture of Fort Harrison was effected on the morning of the following day, but the Fifty-fifth being held in support of the attacking troops, did not become engaged. In the afternoon it was determined to carry the works beyond, and at four o'clock, Col. Jourdan, in command of the brigade, ordered the Fifty-fifth to charge, and take a redoubt in the enemy's second line. The One Hundred and Fifty-eighth New York was deployed to support it, by advancing through the woods on the left, and the One Hundred and Forty-eighth New York to act as skirmishers on the right. The Fifty-fifth advanced over the open ground in front, a quarter of a mile, under a concentrated fire from three redoubts, supported by a heavy body of infantry. Bravely stemming a torrent of shot and deadly minie-balls, it moved steadily on, and reached a point within twenty yards of the work, when its ranks almost annihilated, and supports failing to come up, it was forced to fall back, leaving the dead and most of the wounded upon the field to fall into the hands of the enemy. Of five commissioned officers and one hundred and fifty enlisted men who marched at the word of command, three officers and seventy-eight men were either killed, wounded, or missing. Lieut. Blaney Adair was among the killed, and Capt. John O'Neil mortally wounded. On the following day the rebels made three attacks on Fort Harrison, but in each they were repulsed with terrible slaughter.

In November, the colors which had been originally presented to the regiment by the Governor before leaving the State, carried in all its campaignings, and latterly almost constantly enshrouded in the smoke and fire of battle, having become badly tattered, application was made for a new stand, which was promptly forwarded. The staff and the few remaining shreds of the old one were deposited in the capitol.

In December the white troops of the Tenth and Eighteenth Corps were consolidated, and formed the Twenty-fourth Corps. The Fifty-fifth was assigned to the Fourth Brigade of the First Division, and was henceforward engaged in performing picket and guard duty on the left bank of the James. On the 10th of December, while stationed at the redoubt on Signal Hill, near the extreme right of our lines, it was attacked by a portion of Longstreet's corps. The demonstrations were feebly made, and were easily repulsed. On the 21st of December, upon the muster out of service of Lieut.-Col. Bennett, at the expiration of his term, Maj. Filler was promoted to succeed him, and Capt. James Metzger was promoted to major.

On the 27th of March, 1865, the First and Second Divisions of the Twenty-fourth Corps, and one division of the Twenty-fifth Corps, under command of Gen. Ord, broke camp, and crossing the James and the Appomattox, proceeded by the rear of the army to Hatcher's Run, and on the morning of the 29th relieved the Second Corps, which moved out still farther to the left. During the 30th and 31st a part of the regiment was on the picket-line near the run, and in the general advance which was made, skirmished with the enemy, losing two men killed, and one commissioned officer and seventeen enlisted men wounded.

On the morning of April 2d, in breaking through the enemy's lines, the Fourth Brigade, of the regiment belonged, commanded by Gen. Fairchild, with the balance of the division, charged Forts Gregg and Baldwin, which, after a strong resistance, were carried, the Fifty-fifth being the first to occupy the latter. The loss here was one commissioned officer killed, and one commissioned officer and four enlisted men wounded. On the morning of April 3d, having ascertained that the rebels had evacuated Petersburg during the previous night, Gen. Ord's column was pushed forward to cut off their line of retreat at Burksville Junction. By a forced march along the South Side Railroad, Ord reached the Junction on the evening of the 5th, a distance of about sixty miles. Resuming the march on the following morning, it hastened forward, seven miles farther, to Rice's Station, the Fifty-fifth leading the column as skirmishers, and losing nine men wounded. At the Station Ord held his position, cutting off the direct way of retreat to Danville, and forcing the rebel column towards Lynchburg. At daylight on the 7th, Ord resumed the march, with the design of again cutting the rebel line of retreat. He reached Appomattox Court-House, a distance of forty-two miles, early on the morning of the 9th, in advance of Lee's columns, and with Sheridan's cavalry held firmly the only avenue of escape. "Sheridan," says Greeley, "was with his cavalry near the court-house, when the Army of Virginia made its last charge. By his order his troops, who were in line of battle, dismounted, gave ground gradually, while showing a steady front, so as to allow our weary infantry time to form and take position. This effected, the horsemen moved swiftly to the right and dismounted, revealing lines of solid infantry in battle array, before whose wall of gleaming bayonets the astonished enemy recoiled in blank despair, as Sheridan and his troopers, passing briskly around the rebel left, prepared to charge the confused, reeling masses. A white flag was now waved by the enemy, before Gen. Custer, who held our cavalry advance, with the information that they had concluded to surrender."

The First and Second Divisions of the Twenty-fourth Corps remained at Appomattox Court-House until the 17th, when they proceeded to Richmond via Farmville, Burksville, and Amelia Court-House, arriving on the 25th. The regiment encamped on the outskirts of the city, and performed fatigue and guard duty until the latter part of July, when it was ordered to report to Maj.-Gen. Hartsuff, at Petersburg. It was stationed at different points, in detachments in Chesterfield, Buckingham, Cumberland, Powhatan, and Amelia Counties, acting under orders from the Freedmen's Bureau. On the 30th of August the regiment was mustered out of service at Petersburg, whence it proceeded to Harrisburg, where it was paid and finally disbanded.

EIGHTIETH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

The authority to raise this regiment was given on the 27th of August, 1861, to William B. Sipes, then of Harrisburg, by the Secretary of War. The companies were recruited, for the most part, by their officers and at their expense, the grade of their commissions depending, as a general rule, upon their success in securing men. Their military experience was in general limited to the three months' service. The companies rendezvoused at Camp Cameron, near Harrisburg, where a regimental organization was effected, and George C. Wynkoop, of Pottsville, was commissioned colonel. Clothing was promptly issued to the men upon entering camp, and the regiment was regularly exercised in dismounted drill. Side arms were received while at Camp Cameron, and horses were supplied, but not issued until after leaving it. On the 18th of December the colors were presented by Governor Curtin from the steps of the State capitol, and on the following day, in pursuance of orders from the Secretary of War, the regiment started for Louisville, Ky., where, upon its arrival, it reported to General Buell, in command of the Department of the Cumberland, and was placed in camp of instruction at Jeffersouville, Ind. Towards the close of January, 1862, the regiment broke camp, and, moving leisurely southward, through Kentucky, arrived at Nashville, Tenn., soon after its occupation by Union forces. Here the three battalions were separated, the first, under Major Wynkoop, in which was Capt. Davis' company, being assigned to Gen. Negley's brigade, and sent with him to Columbia; the second, under Col. Wynkoop, to the command of Gen. Dumont, garrisoning Nashville; and the third, under Maj. Given, to Col. Duffield's command, two companies being stationed at Murfreesborough, and two at Lebanon. The duty imposed at this time consisted in scouting in Western and Middle Tennessee, and as far east as the Cumberland Mountains. The cavalry was kept actively employed in defending the flanks of the army against the irregular bands of the enemy's horse that were prowling on every hand. On the 1st of July the First Battalion, under command of Maj.

Wynkoop, moving with Gen. Smith's brigade, occupied Manchester. On the following day, Capt. C. C. Davis, of Company I, with nine men, was captured while on the picket line, but shortly after exchanged.

When Buell, in September, made his retrograde movement through Kentucky, and subsequently his advance, the First Battalion, under Maj. Wynkoop, accompanied him, participating in the battle of Perryville, losing four men wounded and three taken prisoners. The Second and Third Battalions remained with the garrison at Nashville, and was attached to Gen. Negley's command. They were employed in scouting and foraging, and in assisting to defend the city.

Early in November, 1862, Gen. Rosecrans, who had superseded Gen. Buell in command of the Army of the Cumberland, made a complete reorganization. Up to this time the cavalry had not been formed in brigades and divisions, but had been scattered over Tennessee, Kentucky, and a portion of Alabama, doing very hard duty but accomplishing very little. Gen. D. S. Stanley was now assigned to the command of the cavalry, and made a thorough organization of it for efficient service, the Seventh being assigned to the First Brigade of the Second Division. Little of importance transpired to break the monotony of the picket and outpost duty until the 26th of December, when the army advanced on the enemy at Murfreesborough. The First Brigade led the centre on the Nashville and Murfreesborough Pike, the regiments alternating daily, which brought the Seventh at the head of the column on the 27th. The entire march from Nashville to Stone River was a continuous battle between the cavalry of the two armies. Upon the arrival of the division at Stone River, on the 29th, the resistance was found too strong for the cavalry to move, and it was withdrawn to the right flank and rear. On the 30th a battalion of the Seventh Pennsylvania and one of the Third Kentucky formed a chain of vedettes in rear of the line of battle, with orders to drive up all stragglers. On the same day, Wheeler captured the train of the Twenty-eighth Brigade, on the Jefferson Pike, between Stewart's Creek and Lavergne. Taking a battalion of the Seventh and the Fourth Michigan, Col. Minty moved to its relief. "I met the enemy," says Col. Minty in his report, "who were chiefly dressed in our uniforms. The Seventh Pennsylvania drove them until after dark." On the 31st the brigade, now reduced to about nine hundred and fifty men, took position, after crossing Overall's Creek, about three-quarters of a mile from the Murfreesborough and Nashville Pike, Capt. Jennings's battalion being posted in the woods near the right of the Fourth Michigan. "The enemy," says Col. Minty, "advanced rapidly with two thousand five hundred cavalry, mounted and dismounted, and three pieces of artillery, all under command of Gens. Wheeler, Wharton, and Buford. They drove back the Fourth Michigan to the line of the First Tennessee skirmishers, and then attacked the Seventh Pennsylvania with great fury, but met with a determined resistance. I went forward to the line of dismounted skirmishers, and endeavored to move it to the right to strengthen the Seventh Pennsylvania, but the moment the right of the line showed itself from behind the fence where it was posted, the whole of the enemy's fire was directed on it, turning it completely around. At this moment the Fifteenth Pennsylvania gave way and retreated rapidly, leaving the battalion of the Seventh Pennsylvania and the dismounted men entirely unsupported, and leaving them no alternative but to retreat." When, on this day, the right wing of the army was driven back in confusion, many of the men of the battalion, on the line of the vedettes, were captured by the enemy while endeavoring to drive forward the straggling infantry. After the battle was over, and the enemy was making the best of his way from the field, the cavalry was sent in pursuit. "About six miles out they met the enemy in force; a sharp skirmish ensued. The Fourth Cavalry, First Tennessee Infantry, and the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry having to bear the brunt of the fight on our side. The enemy was driven from the field with heavy loss, and we returned to within a mile and a half of Murfreesborough and went into camp." The loss of the regiment in this entire battle was two killed, nine wounded, and fifty missing.

On the 31st of January, the First Brigade was ordered to proceed to Rover and break up a rebel outpost. Arriving near the place, his pickets were encountered and driven in by the Fourth Michigan, when the Seventh Pennsylvania was ordered to draw sabre and charge, which was executed with a cheer, breaking the rebel line and utterly routing his entire command. The pursuit was maintained for ten miles, causing a loss of half his force. After scouting inside the rebel lines for two weeks, inflicting considerable damage upon the enemy, the brigade returned to camp at Murfreesborough. Shortly afterward learning that the enemy had reoccupied Rover in force, and had strengthened it by an entrenched infantry and artillery camp at Unionville, a town five miles from Rover, and sixteen from Shelbyville, where a large part of the rebel army was in camp, Gen. Sheridan was ordered to move with his division to Eagleville, three miles west of Rover, for a diversion in favor of the cavalry. When, therefore, at sunrise on the 4th, the First Brigade attacked the enemy at Rover, the surprise was complete. After a sharp skirmish the pickets were driven in, and the Seventh was ordered to charge with the sabre. It was made in column, half platoon front, and received the concentrated fire of over two thousand rifles; but without faltering, being supported by the Fourth United States on the right, and the Fourth Michigan on the left as carbineers, it dashed forward, broke the centre of the rebel line, and drove it in confusion towards Unionville. Not satisfied with his success, Col. Minty threw the flanking regiments into columns, on roads parallel with the pike on which the Seventh was moving, and, sounding the charge along the whole line, burst upon the astonished rebels at Unionville, entering their camp on the heels of the flying fugitives from Rover. But little resistance was offered, only one regiment of infantry attempting to form line, the artillery having been moved the day before to resist the threatened advance of Sheridan. The Seventh charged through the camp, and then gave chase to the rebel cavalry retreating towards Shelbyville. The loss of the Seventh was two killed and seven wounded.

On the 4th of March, 1863, Maj. Charles C. Davis was in command of the Seventh Cavalry when the attack was made on the Fourth Alabama, Col. Russell, nine hundred men, the Seventh numbering one hundred and ninety-two. The latter charged with the sabre, captured their camp and all their personal effects, pursued them seven miles, captured their wagon-train of seventeen, six of which were mule teams. One hundred and six of the Confederates were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, twenty of the latter within one hundred yards of Gen. Hood's camp.

From Unionville the command marched the same day to Eagleville, where it joined Sheridan, and with him proceeded to Franklin, then to Columbia, skirmishing with Van Dorn and Forrest at Spring Hill and Rutherford Creek. The Seventh afterwards returned to Murfreesborough via Franklin, reaching camp on the 15th of March. The command was engaged with Morgan at Snow Hill, near Liberty, on the 3d of April, with a loss of one killed and one wounded; fought Duke's brigade on the 20th; assisted in the capture of McMinnville, May 6th; repelled a rebel demonstration on Murfreesborough on the 14th; and fought Morgan at Alexandria on the 3d of June, in all of which the Union forces were victorious except the last.

On the 24th, Gen. Rosecrans commenced his advance on Tullahoma and Shelbyville. The cavalry, under Gen. Stanley, moved on the right flank of the army. On the morning of the 27th, Col. Minty was ordered to charge and carry Guy's Gap, on the Murfreesborough Pike. With the Fourth Michigan Cavalry leading the advance, and the First Division supporting the flanks, he moved rapidly on through the gap, driving the rebels towards Shelbyville, and making captures on every hand. Arrived within five miles of the town, the enemy opened with artillery from his intrenchments. Col. Minty promptly deployed the Fourth Michigan and Fourth United States, as skirmishers, mounted, and held the Seventh in column. The advance was sounded, when from some cause the men commenced cheering, the skirmish line charged, and Col. Minty, taking advantage of the favorable moment, ordered the Seventh to charge also. Dashing forward with wild shouts, the intrenchments were stormed and taken with many prisoners, and, nerved by their success, pushed on after the flying foe. A mile from town a rebel regiment was hemmed in in an open field and captured, offering little resistance. As the troops advanced towards the town they were suddenly checked by the rapid fire from a battery of six pieces, posted in the public square. Col. Minty at once brought up two pieces of artillery, and, directing the Fourth United States and the Fourth Michigan to take a parallel street to the right, Col. Jordan, with the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, of the First Division, the first street to the left, and three companies of the Seventh, under Capt. Davis, to take the centre, the signal to charge was given. The Seventh was obliged to move in the face of the rebel guns, which were trained full upon it, and were served with great rapidity, at first dealing shot and shell, and then double-shotted canister. But, unmindful of the storm, Davis dashed up the narrow street, filling it from curb to curb, the shouts of the men ringing above the noise of battle. As they came near, they were saluted by a shower of bullets from the rifles and pistols of the enemy. A short run brought the column hand to hand with the hostile force, and a brief struggle ensued over the guns; but the slash of the sabre and the rapid rounds from pistols and carbines proved too much for rebel valor. He was driven in confusion, and the powerful battery was captured, as few have been, by a direct charge of cavalry. After the loss of his artillery, a panic seemed to seize the enemy, and he fled in consternation to the bank of Duck River, a mile away, where he attempted to form a line to cover the passage of his trains. But it was a vain attempt. Charge after charge was delivered with an impetuosity inspired of success, and, finally Shelbyville, with all its military stores, fell into Union hands, and a powerful impetus was given to the retreat of the entire rebel army. Wheeler's boasted cavalry was broken, and never afterwards recovered from the blow.

On the 3d of July the regiment was engaged in a skirmish at Elk River, on the 17th of August at Sparta, and early in September moved with the army on the Chickamauga campaign. The march was wearisome to man and beast, obliged to move with rapidity and to cross rugged mountains. From the 18th to the 22d, in the preliminary operations, and during the progress of the battle the regiment was in constant motion, and performed important service. On the 1st of August it marched with the cavalry in pursuit of Wheeler, passing through East and Middle Tennessee into Alabama. This march lasted eighteen consecutive days and nights, with little rest and frequent running fights.

Early in the year 1864, while stationed at Huntsville, Ala., a large part of the regiment re-enlisted and was given a veteran furlough. Upon returning, the numbers having been swelled by recruits to about eighteen hundred, rank and file, it was stationed at Columbia, where it was ordered to drill and make preparation for the opening of the spring campaign. While upon furlough, Col. Sipes, who had succeeded to the command, drew Spencer carbines, improved sabres, and horse equipments for the entire regiment, and when freshly mounted, as it was at Nashville, it was well prepared for active service. On the 30th of April the regiment, under his command, broke camp and, joining Garrard's division, set forward with Sherman towards Atlanta. On the 15th of May it was engaged at Rome, and on the 27th at Dallas and Villa Rica Road, at the latter place having a sharp skirmish, losing three killed, six wounded, and one taken prisoner; at Big Shanty, on June 9th, with one killed, two wounded, and two prisoners; at McAfee Cross-Roads, on the 11th, with two killed and four prisoners; at Monday Creek, on the 20th, with one killed, ten wounded, and six prisoners; at Kenesaw Mountain, on the 27th; in a raid on the Augusta and Atlanta Railroad, on the 18th of July; in a raid on Covington and the destruction of the railroad, on the 21st; at Flat Rock, on the 28th, with a loss of two wounded; and on the 1st of August entered the trenches in front of Atlanta. On the 17th it moved with Kilpatrick on his raid, on the 19th had a skirmish at Fairburn and Jonesboro', and on the 20th a sharp engagement at Lovejoy Station, in which Capt. James G. Taylor and Lieut. Chauncey C. Hemans were among the killed. The loss in this raid was five killed, twenty-four wounded, and fifteen missing. On the 12th of October it was engaged in the battle at Rome, and on the following day made a charge with the sabre on infantry, routing them and capturing two pieces of artillery, losing one killed and four wounded. Two weeks later it was engaged at Lead's Cross-Roads, which closed the campaign. The regiment having suffered severely in men, horses, and equipments during a campaign rarely equaled for severity, was no longer fit for the field, and was ordered to Louisville, Ky., to be remounted, equipped, and prepared again for active duty. While here many of the officers, whose three years' term of service had expired, were mustered out.

On the 22d of March, 1865, the Seventh was ordered on the expedition from Eastport, Miss., across the Gulf States. On the 1st of April it was engaged in the battle of Plantersville, Ala., and on the following day arrived in front of Selma, in the assault upon the works of which it participated. On the 16th of April it was in the engagement near Columbus, and on the 20th it arrived at Macon, Ga., where, the war having substantially closed, it remained until the 13th of August, when it was mustered out of service.

EIGHTY-FOURTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

The Eighty-fourth Regiment was recruited under the direction of William G. Murray, in the counties of Blair, Lycoming, Clearfield, Dauphin, Columbia, Cameron, and Westmoreland. The men rendezvoused at Camp Crossman, near Huntingdon, and subsequently at Camp Curtin. Recruiting commenced early in August, and towards the close of October an organization was effected by the choice of the following field-officers: William G. Murray, colonel; Thomas C. On the 31st of December the regiment was ordered to Hancock, Md., arriving Jan. 2, 1862. Here it received arms, Belgian muskets, and crossing the Potomac, proceeded rapidly to Bath, where a portion of the Thirty-ninth Illinois, with a section of artillery,

Lieut. Mublenberg, was posted, confronting the enemy. Upon his arrival Col. Murray assumed command of the entire force, and at four o'clock on the morning of the 4th advanced to the eminence beyond the town and deployed in line of battle. He soon learned that Stonewall Jackson, with a well-appointed force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, greatly superior to his own, was in his front. At eight o'clock Jackson began to press upon him, driving in his skirmishers. By skillful maneuvering, preserving a bold front, he kept the enemy at bay until near nightfall, when he fell back to Hancock, with the loss of but one man, drowned in crossing the stream. During the night Gen. Lander arrived and assumed command, and Jackson, who had approached and was shelling the town, sent Col. Ashby, on the morning of the 5th, with a flag of truce, to demand its immediate surrender. Lander defiantly refused, and having been reinforced with Parrott guns, a spirited cannonade ensued, which was kept up during the entire day following. But this demonstration on the part of Jackson was to cover his movement upon Romney, and Lander, as soon as he discovered his antagonist's purpose, hastened away to secure its evacuation, which he did, bringing his forces into Cumberland. The Eighty-fourth made a forced march to the latter place, arriving on the 12th. Jackson having been foiled in his expedition to Romney by the rapid movement of Lander, returned to Winchester, and the Eighty-fourth was posted successively during the winter at the North Branch Bridge, at the South Branch Bridge, and at Paw Paw, points along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. On the 2d of March Gen. Lander died, the command devolving on Col. Kimball, and soon after the regiment moved on to Winchester. Here Gen. Shields took command of the division, and about the middle of the month drove the enemy up the valley, four miles beyond Strasburg, skirmishing with his rear-guard, who destroyed bridges and obstructed the way as he went. As Shields returned to Winchester, Jackson, reinforced, followed closely on his track, the Eighty-fourth marching on the 20th from its camp near Strasburg, without a halt, to Winchester. At five P.M. on the 22d it returned at double-quick through the town, and moved to the support of the Union cavalry, posted at the west end, which the enemy was engaged in shelling. Soon after the regiment arrived upon the ground Gen. Shields was struck by a fragment of shell and disabled, the command again devolving on Col. Kimball. The Eighty-fourth was ordered to fix bayonets in anticipation of a charge, but the enemy soon after retreated, and was driven about two miles in the direction of Kernstown, where the regiment bivouacked for the night. On the following morning it was engaged in laying out the ground for a camp, when the enemy, at eleven A.M., attacked, and it was immediately ordered into line in support of artillery. Under cover of a wooded eminence on the right the enemy advanced, and with infantry and artillery gained a foothold upon the flank, behind rocks and a stone wall, where he seriously threatened the integrity of the Union line. This position the Eighty-fourth was ordered to charge. Forming upon the high ground near the Kernstown road, it moved gallantly through an open valley and up towards the wooded eminence, where were the guns. As it gained the crest the rebel infantry rose up from behind rocks and the fence where they had been concealed, and poured upon it withering volleys. The fire was returned with good effect; but, standing without shelter and at close range, it was fearfully decimated. Col. Murray's horse was struck, when he dismounted and advanced on foot. A moment later, while at the head of his men, and leading them on for the capture of the guns, he was himself struck in the forehead by a minie-ball and instantly killed. At this juncture, being without a field-officer, with two of its captains fallen, the regiment fell into some confusion, and a part of it fell back under the shelter of the crest. The remainder, led by Lieut. George Zinn, taking shelter behind trees, kept up a steady fire. At this juncture the Fifth Ohio came up on the right, and, with other troops, forced the enemy from his position. A general advance was ordered along the entire line, and the foe was driven in utter rout. Three hundred prisoners, two guns, four caissons, and a thousand stand of small-arms were taken. Out of two hundred and sixty of the Eighty-fourth who went into battle twenty-three were killed and sixty-seven wounded. Col. Murray, Capt. Patrick Gallagher, and Lieut. Charles Reem were killed.

After the battle the Eighty-fourth, under command of Maj. Barrett, was assigned to provost duty in the town of Berryville, where it remained until the 2d of May. It then joined in the general advance up the valley, and passing through Strasburg and Front Royal, proceeded to Fredericksburg. Scarcely had it reached its destination, when it was ordered back to Front Royal, where it arrived on the 30th. On the following day a smart skirmish was had on the Winchester road, after which the brigade,—the Fourth of Shields' division,—commanded by Col. Carroll, moved on towards Port Republic, arriving on the 8th of June. "We charged," says an officer of the Eighty-fourth, "what we took to be a wagon-train, but soon found that it consisted of about thirty pieces of artillery with wagon covers, which gave us a warm reception. The next day, June 9th, the enemy came out in large numbers, and advanced to the attack. He came up in fine style, and fought hard to turn our right flank, but was repulsed with great loss. While we were following up our advantage, however, his forces outflanked us on the left, and came in on our rear. We then faced about, and the Third Brigade of our division coming up, we had them between two fires, and they soon fled to the mountains. He had by this time reformed his lines in front, and was coming down in such numbers as to make a resistance out of the question, and the general gave the order to fall back. Now commenced a running fight. He followed us for several miles, and kept his batteries at work in a manner that showed that he was familiar with the route. His cavalry made repeated charges, but was repulsed by the steady fire of our infantry. We finally came upon the First and Second Brigades, drawn up in line, with Gen. Shields in command, when the enemy gave over the pursuit and rapidly retired."

From Port Republic the division marched to Alexandria, whence the First and Second Brigades proceeded to the Peninsula, and the Third and Fourth went into camp near the town. The campaign had been a severe one, the marches long and difficult, the men poorly clad, and much of the time subsisting on scanty rations. On the 25th of June, Samuel M. Bowman, of Columbia County, late a major in the Fourth Illinois Cavalry, who had seen service under Grant and Sherman in the Western army, was commissioned colonel, Maj. Barrett was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and Adj. Thomas H. Craig to major. In July the regiment broke camp and marched out to join Pope's army. Carroll's brigade was here attached to Ricketts' division of McDowell's corps. In the battle of Cedar Mountain, which occurred on the 9th of August, the regiment was not under fire until after dark, when a few of the enemy's shots and shells reached its ranks. On the 14th it joined in pursuit of the enemy, following him up to the Rapidan, occupying the line of the river until the 19th, when it retired to the Rappahannock. Here for a week the rebels were held at bay, the fighting being general along the entire line, for the most part with the artillery. As soon as it was ascertained that the enemy had turned Pope's right flank, Ricketts' division was sent to Thoroughfare Gap, to check the progress of Longstreet's corps on its way to join Jackson, already at Manassas Junction, in Pope's rear. In the engagement which ensued the regiment took little part. On the 29th it moved into position on the right flank of the army, near Groveton, and on the morning of the 30th was warmly engaged. It remained upon the field until after dark, and for several hours after the mass of the army had crossed Bull Run. It was finally charged by a force of the enemy which approached under cover of darkness. Uncertain whether it was friend or foe advancing, Lieut. Alban H. Nixon volunteered to go out and ascertain his true character. He passed the outer pickets without discovery, and soon found himself in the very midst of Gen. Pender's South Carolina troops, who were moving upon the flank of the brigade, and only waiting the signal that its retreat was cut off to move upon and capture it entire. At the peril of his life Nixon shouted, "They are the enemy, boys!" when a timely retreat was ordered, and the greater part of the brigade was snatched from the clutches of Pender's troops. Enraged at having their well-laid plans thus suddenly frustrated, they threatened Nixon with instant death, and were only prevented from executing it by a fellow-prisoner, who seized him by the arm and exclaimed, "You will not shoot an unarmed man?" He was spared, and with other officers and men found upon the skirmish line was marched away to Richmond. When the regiment arrived within the defenses of Washington it had scarcely seventy men in its ranks fit for duty. In consequence of its severe losses it was ordered to light duty at Arlington Heights, in the command of Gen. Whipple, where it remained during the Antietam campaign. In the mean time, through the exertions of patriotic citizens of Pennsylvania, some of whom accepted commissions, headed by Col. Bowman, about four hundred recruits were added to its ranks, which, with the return of men from hospitals and from furlough, brought its numbers up to the full standard of a regiment.

About the middle of October it proceeded to rejoin the army, near Berlin, and marched with it to the neighborhood of Fredericksburg. In the campaign which followed it continued in Gen. Whipple's independent division. On the second day of the battle of Fredericksburg, Gen. Griffin called on Gen. Whipple for Carroll's brigade. It was promptly ordered forward, and moved up through the town under an incessant shower of shot and shell. Taking temporary refuge in a cut of the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad, the officers dismounted. At the word of command, climbing the steep acclivity at double-quick, the entire brigade rushed on and soon reached the front. Such was the spirit and daring of the movement that two companies of the Eighty-fourth reached a point considerably in advance of the line of battle, whence they had to be recalled. During the following night the enemy approached stealthily under cover of darkness, with the expectation of surprising and forcing the part of the line where lay the Eighty-fourth and One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania, but was handsomely repulsed. At the close of the action the regiment retired with the army, and went into winter-quarters. Gen. Carroll, in his official report, says, "Where all did so well it seems invidious to particularize; but I cannot forbear mentioning Col. S. M. Bowman and Maj. Milton Opp, of the Eighty-fourth, and Lieut.-Col. Crowther, of the One Hundred and Tenth, whose coolness, judgment, and unsparing bravery were conspicuous."

Under Gen. Hooker the army was reorganized, and the Eighty-fourth and One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania and Twelfth New Hampshire constituted the Second Brigade of the Third Division (Whipple's) of the Third Corps, and Col. Bowman was assigned to its command. During the winter the principal duty consisted in guard and picket, in which the regiment shared, frequently meeting parties of the enemy, who made their appearance on the north bank of the river. By close scrutiny Col. Bowman discovered that permits, or what purported to be permits, from Union authorities were used by the enemy to come within our lines. These irregularities were reported and effectually broken up.

The part taken by the regiment in the Chancellorsville campaign is clearly shown by the following extract from Maj. Opp's official report: "After severe marches, occupying a period of five days from the 28th of April, we were brought in contact with the enemy on the afternoon of the 2d of May. In a reconnaissance made by two divisions of the Third Corps to the left of Chancellorsville, and in the vicinity of an old furnace, the regiment was ordered to advance in line, with flanking companies thrown forward as skirmishers, to unmask the position of the enemy. Under the immediate supervision of Col. Bowman, commanding the brigade, the object was successfully and handsomely attained, with the loss of only two men wounded. On the morning of the 3d, at daylight, we were judiciously and strongly posted to the left of the plank-road, and to the left of Chancellorsville, as a reserve force. The attack of the enemy had continued but a short time, when one line to the front of us gave way. Col. Bowman's orders to the Eighty-fourth and the One Hundred and Tenth to advance and occupy the position just abandoned were promptly and gallantly executed. The old lines were regained, and held for about an hour and until all the regiments on the right and left of the Eighty-fourth had retired, leaving us in an isolated and exposed position. In the hope that reinforcements would arrive, I still held the men in place, maintaining a steady and effective fire to the front. It was discovered, however, that a large force of the enemy had succeeded, by making an extensive détour under cover of a dense wood, in gaining our rear, where he was supported by a vigorous enfilading fire from several guns planted on an eminence to our front and left. It became obvious that to remain was equivalent to capture in a body, while to retreat was perilous in the extreme. The latter alternative was adopted. The retreat was executed in good order, but not without heavy losses and severe fighting. In numerous instances the men clubbed their muskets in hand-to-hand encounters. Parties who had been overpowered, seizing opportune moments, took up guns at hand, demanded and obtained the surrender of many of their captors. Lieut. Farley, of Company F, who had been captured in the strife, headed a number of our men, and succeeded in extricating himself, and in capturing one captain, two lieutenants, and twenty-five men. These, with five men captured before the retreat began, made an aggregate of thirty-three rebel prisoners taken by the regiment. Our own losses were necessarily heavy from the peculiarity of the situation. Of three hundred and ninety-one officers and men engaged, two hundred and nineteen were killed, wounded, and missing. Capt. Jacob Peterman was among the killed, and Capt. C. G.

Jackson, Lieuts. William Hayes, Albert Steinman, John R. Ross, George S. Good, and Asst.-Surg. John S. Waggoner severely wounded, most of whom fell into the enemy's hands."

The regiment participated in the operations of the brigade on the new line taken up on the morning of the 4th, but without further casualties. Gen. Whipple was killed in this engagement, and the losses of his division were so great that it was broken up and the regiments assigned to other commands. The Eighty-fourth became part of Gen. Carr's brigade of the Second Corps, and was separated from the One Hundred and Tenth, with which it had served from its entrance to duty. On the 11th of June, Col. Bowman was ordered to special duty, and never afterward rejoined the regiment. In December previous, Maj. Milton Opp had been promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and Capt. George Zinn to major.

In the Gettysburg campaign, the regiment upon its arrival at Taneytown, Md., was detailed as guard to the corps train, and immediately proceeded with it to Westminster, where it was employed in forwarding supplies to the battle-field, a vitally important duty, but one devoid of heroic incident.

Upon the return of the army to Virginia, the regiment was engaged at Wapping Heights on the 24th of July, in the neighborhood of Thoroughfare Gap on the 10th of October, at Freeman's Ford in a sharp skirmish on the 13th, at Bristoe Station on the 14th and again on the 19th, at Kelly's Ford on the 7th of November, at Jacob's Ford on November 27th, at Locust Grove on the 28th, and at Mine Run on the 30th, losing four men mortally wounded, five slightly wounded, five missing, and one officer, Lieut. Good, captured. At the conclusion of the campaign the regiment returned to the neighborhood of Brandy Station, where it went into winter-quarters. In January, 1864, a considerable number of the regiment re-enlisted, and were given a veteran furlough. On the 6th of February the enemy crossed the Rapidan in some force, and the Eighty-fourth moved with the column sent against him. He was driven back and one hundred of his men were taken prisoners.

Upon the opening of the Wilderness campaign the regiment moved with the corps by the Germania Ford, and while marching on south along the Fredericksburg road, on the afternoon of the 5th of May, the enemy was discovered moving down in heavy force upon its flank. Line of battle was immediately formed and advanced to meet him, the fighting becoming general along the whole line, extending for miles. On the following day the fighting was very severe, and proved particularly disastrous to the Eighty-fourth, resulting in the loss of many brave men. Lieut.-Col. Opp, while leading in a charge, received a wound through the right lung which proved a mortal hurt. He was a brave man, and sincerely mourned by his men. On the 7th the regiment moved on towards the left, and on the 8th, near Spottsylvania Court-House, Company K had a brisk skirmish. At Pamunkey River, on the 10th, the regiment was again engaged, driving the enemy across the stream. On the morning of the 12th it joined in the brilliant charge of Hancock's corps, carrying elaborate lines of works, and making large captures of men and guns. The following extract from a diary of Capt. L. B. Sampson will convey some idea of the arduous service of the regiment in this campaign: "May 14th skirmished, moved to the right, skirmished all the afternoon; 16th, lay in line all day; 17th, fought on the picket line, drove the enemy into his works; 18th, skirmished all day; 19th, marched to Spottsylvania Court-House; 20th, lay in line of battle all day, received a good shelling; 21st, marched to Guinea Station, thence to Bowling Green, thence to Milford Station on the Po River; 22d, rested all day; 23d, marched to the North Anna, charged and carried the rebel works, Company K volunteering to hold a bridge,—a warm time they had of it; 24th, crossed the river under a heavy fire; 25th and 26th, rested; 27th, marched to the Pamunkey and crossed at Hanover City; 29th, skirmished and built works; 30th, lay in the works all day; 31st, our brigade, Col. Blaisdell commanding, fought the first battle of Pleasant Hill; June 1st, our regiment had a sharp skirmish at Pleasant Hill,—we lost a good many men for a small fight." In this latter engagement, Lieut. Nixon, who had saved the regiment from capture at Bull Run by his timely signal, even at the peril of his life, was again severely wounded with the loss of his left arm.

Such was the general character of the service until the regiment reached the James on the 14th of June, when it crossed and was at once engaged in the operations of the siege of Petersburg. Advancing the lines, building fortifications, and defending the ground gained, interspersed with occasional assaults, filled up the measure of its duty until the 27th of July, when it recrossed the James, and had part in the engagement at Deep Bottom. Returning to the lines in front of Petersburg, it was again engaged in the varied duties of the siege until the 14th of August, when it again moved to Deep Bottom, and in the sharp engagement which ensued the enemy was driven out of his works at Charles City Cross-Roads and some prisoners taken. Returning again to Petersburg, it resumed its place upon the works. On the 1st of October it moved by rail with the corps to Yellow House, and thence marched to the extreme left of the lines. The first line of the enemy's works was charged and carried. The second line was charged, but the column was repulsed. Lieut.-Col. Zinn had command of the assaulting party, and while urging on his men in the final charge was severely wounded.

In October the men whose terms of service had expired were mustered out, and the veterans and recruits were organized in a battalion of four companies, which remained on duty until the 13th of January, 1865, when it was consolidated with the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania, and thenceforward until the end of the war formed part of that organization. The battalion participated in the operations of the corps upon the Weldon Railroad on the 27th of October, and again on the 9th of December, in the latter destroying the road as far as Bellefield Station. Upon the consolidation of the battalion with the Fifty-seventh, Lieut.-Col. Zinn became colonel, George W. Perkins lieutenant-colonel, and Capt. Samuel Bryan major. The Fifty-seventh was finally mustered out of service on the 29th of June, 1865.

NINETY-SECOND REGIMENT (NINTH CAVALRY).

The Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, Ninety-second of the line, at first known as the Lochiel Cavalry, was organized on the 29th of August, 1861, in compliance with an order of the Hon. Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, with Edward C. Williams, of Harrisburg, as colonel, Thomas C. James, of Philadelphia, as lieutenant-colonel, and Thomas J. Jordan, of Harrisburg, as major. Under this authority the officers above named appointed the necessary line-officers, and directed them to proceed at once to recruit men for their respective companies. The place of rendezvous was at Camp Cameron, near Harrisburg. The regiment was composed of twelve companies, principally raised in the counties of Dauphin, Luzerne, Lancaster, Huntingdon, Perry, Cumberland, Mifflin, Blair, Wayne, Chester, Lehigh, Susquehanna, and in the city and county of Philadelphia. The field and many of the fine-officers and privates had served for the short term in 1861, and Col. Williams had served in the militia as early as 1832; had served with Gen. Scott in Mexico from the capture of Vera Cruz to the first surrender of the capital, receiving a wound at the storming of Chapultepec, and had commanded, with the rank of brigadier-general, the brigade known as the Scott Legion of Philadelphia in the three months' service.

By the 1st of October the companies were full, and the men, by drill and discipline, fitted for the field. On the 20th of November, by order of the Secretary of War, the regiment moved by rail to Pittsburgh, and thence by boat to Louisville, Ky., where upon its arrival it was reported to Gen. Buell, in command of the Department of the Cumberland, and placed in camp at Jeffersonville, Ind., opposite to Louisville. Mounted drill was at once commenced, a school for officers established, and by the 10th of January, 1862, by constant hard work and strict discipline, the regiment had acquired such proficiency that it was ordered to the front, the enemy occupying the line of Green River. On the advance of Gens. Buell and Mitchell, in the early part of February, upon Gen. A. Sidney Johnston's position at Bowling Green, in compliance with an urgent request made by citizens and the Legislature of Kentucky, the regiment was ordered to remain for the protection of the State, and was posted, the First Battalion, under command of Col. Williams, at Grayson Springs, the Second, under Lieut.-Col. James, at Calhoun, in Western Kentucky, and the Third, under Maj. Jordan, at Bacon Creek, on the line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad.

On the 5th of March the regiment was ordered into Tennessee, the First Battalion to Springfield, the Second to Clarksville, and the Third to Nashville. Soon after reaching Nashville the Third Battalion was moved to Gallatin, and on the 4th of May it first met the enemy under Morgan at Lebanon, where, with the Seventh Pennsylvania and the Third Kentucky Cavalry, it most signally defeated that daring partisan, capturing two hundred and ninety-three of his men, with Lieut.-Col. Wood, Morgan's second in command, Morgan himself narrowly escaping capture by the fleetness of his celebrated steed to the Cumberland River, which he swam, leaving the animal a prize to the regiment. On the 14th of May the Third Battalion marched from Lebanon to Livingston, in Overton County, after Morgan, who was again in the field, and at Spring Creek came upon his rear-guard, where after a spirited action the guard was captured, with the quartermaster of Morgan's brigade. Pushing on after Morgan, who declined fighting, he was forced to the Cumberland Mountains at Sparta, where his command scattered upon the various roads leading to Chattanooga. On the 3d of June the Third Battalion marched from Lebanon, Tenn., to Tompkinsville, Ky., and on the 6th, Capt. Hugh McCullough was warmly engaged at Moore's Hill, defeating Col. Hamilton, who had a largely superior force, with a loss of the leader, Capt. McCullough, and four men killed and ten badly wounded. Capt. McCullough, a brave and competent officer, was shot through the stomach while leading his men to the charge. On the 9th of July, 1862, Morgan, with a force of over two thousand men, advanced against Tompkinsville. To meet this force Maj. Jordan, who was in command of the post, had but two hundred and thirty, and after maintaining an unequal contest for two hours, finding himself being surrounded, he retired to Burksville, Ky. In this engagement fifty-seven of the enemy were killed and one hundred and forty wounded, while the loss in the battalion was only ten killed, fourteen wounded, and nineteen taken prisoners. Among the latter was Maj. Jordan, who had his horse killed in the action. Lieut. Aaron Sullivan was among the killed.

In the mean time the First Battalion remained at Springfield, and the Second at Clarksville. Finding that the enemy was penetrating Kentucky in large force, the regiment was again united under Col. Williams, at Lebanon, Ky., early in August, and was employed in keeping the State clear of Morgan and his bands and in watching the advance of Kirby Smith. After the disastrous battle of Richmond, Ky., on the 30th, in connection with the Ninth Kentucky Cavalry, it covered the retreat of Gen. Nelson to Louisville, fighting daily the enemy's advance under Jenkins and Col. Scott, of the First Louisiana Cavalry, who displayed great activity, attacking at every favorable point. At Shelbyville it had a sharp encounter, defeating Jenkins, killing twenty-seven of his men and capturing forty-four. After reaching Louisville it was employed in guarding the roads in the direction of Tennessee, on which Gen. Buell was marching for the relief of Kentucky. Upon Gen. Buell's arrival, in conjunction with the Second Michigan, it took the advance to Perryville, and by its boldness in pushing the enemy's rear, brought on the sanguinary battle fought there, sustaining the fire of his infantry until relieved by McCook's corps. It then formed on the right of the line, and by its steadiness foiled every attempt of the enemy's cavalry to turn its flank. In this action it had ten killed and twenty-seven wounded. In general orders issued after the action Gen. Buell says, "The Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry behaved most bravely, being at one time compelled to stand for three-quarters of an hour under the concentrated fire of three batteries of the enemy's artillery, and only retiring when ordered to do so."

By hard service the regiment had by this time become much weakened, and about one-half of the men were dismounted. It was accordingly ordered to Louisville for fresh horses and equipments. After receiving these, in company with the Second Michigan, it marched to Nicholasville to prepare for a raid into East Tennessee upon the railroads communicating with the rebel capital, by which succor should be prevented from reaching Gen. Bragg before the advance of Rosecrans to Stone River. On the 22d of December the expedition, under command of Gen. Carter, left Nicholasville, and on reaching Big Hill all the commissary stores and one hundred rounds of ammunition per man were distributed, roads and civilization were left behind, and the command took to the deer-paths of Pine, Cumberland, and Clinch Mountains. To one unacquainted with the way it is difficult to form any adequate conception of the hardships which the troops encountered on this march. These mountains, cheerless and dark, and savage as when Boone first saw them, are at this point one hundred miles wide, and can only be crossed by following the paths worn by the deer and the Indian ages before. Over these paths, in single file, marched the regiments, traveling day and night, swimming the Cumberland and Clinch Rivers, and fording the numerous creeks on the route, until the 1st of January, 1863, when it reached the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad at the bridge spanning the Watauga. This was defended by a company of about one hundred strong from the command of Gen. Humphrey Marshall, well intrenched. As time was all important, the cavalry was dismounted, the place carried by assault, and the bridge, a structure of two long spans, was burned. As it was deemed unwise to cumber the column with prisoners, the captured party was at once paroled, and the command moved down the railroad ten or twelve miles to the point where it crosses the Holston River. The bridge here was defended by a force of two hundred and fifty men, having stockades and intrenchments skillfully constructed for its defense. Without delay these were stormed, and the entire rebel force taken prisoners. In this action the Ninth lost six killed and twenty-five wounded. Among the latter was Sergt. Ellis T. Hamersly, who was shot through the thigh, the missile inflicting a painful and dangerous wound. All the badly wounded were left with the paroled enemy, the command being without ambulances, with the exception of Sergt. Hamersly, who resolutely refused to remain, and succeeded in keeping his horse and moving with the column until it reached Kentucky. After leaving the Holston bridge, and destroying a trestle-work of nearly a mile across a swamp, the command faced for Kentucky, and by skillful strategy, joined with signal enterprise and rapidity of movement, succeeded in eluding the enemy, eight thousand strong, under Marshall, and recrossed the Cumberland Mountains, returning by the same paths by which it advanced. The success of this raid, in the face of a greatly superior force of the enemy, was the cause of so much chagrin to the rebel chieftains, that Marshall, the commander, was relieved and never afterwards restored to his command.

The regiment reached Nicholasville from this raid on the night of the 13th of January, with two-thirds of its men dismounted, the animals for more than one hundred miles while crossing the mountains being without food. In the mean time, Col. Williams, for some cause of difficulty involving a question of rank, had resigned, and Lieut.-Col. James on the 13th of January died. Maj. Jordan was accordingly promoted to colonel. After a few days' rest, the regiment marched to Louisville, where it was remounted, and thence by rail to Nashville. On the 8th of February, two days after its arrival, it proceeded, by order of Gen. Rosecrans, to Franklin, where, after a sharp skirmish, Gen. Forrest's brigade of the enemy was driven from the town. Col. Jordan's command here formed the right wing of the Army of the Cumberland, which was now confronting the enemy at Liberty on the left, Shelbyville and Tullahoma in the centre, and Triune and Franklin on its extreme right. At Spring Hill, fourteen miles in front of Franklin, was the extreme of the left wing of the enemy, commanded by Gen. Van Dorn, Wheeler and Forrest commanding divisions under him, with a force of twelve thousand cavalry. The advance brigade of this force was at Thompson's Station, nine miles out on the Columbia pike, the Eighth Mississippi doing picket duty three miles nearer Franklin, and the Fourth Mississippi performing the same duty five miles to the right, on the Carter's Creek pike. For eighteen days the Ninth, aided by three hundred men from the Second Michigan Cavalry, without other support, confronted this strong rebel force, and daily, to deceive the enemy, made strong attacks upon his advance positions. This bold strategy was entirely successful, and the weakness of the post was not discovered by Van Dorn until the morning of the 4th of March, when he advanced in force to storm the place; but a division of infantry, under Col. John Coburn, of Indiana, having reached Franklin during the night of the 3d, the whole command marched out on the morning of the 4th, and four miles from Franklin met the enemy. After a hotly-contested engagement, which lasted from nine in the morning until three in the afternoon, the enemy was finally driven back to his position at Thompson's Station. In this action the regiment suffered severely, having twelve killed and fifty-one wounded. On the following morning, Col. Coburn, who had assumed command, determined to pursue and drive the enemy from the station, his chosen ground. Immediately after daylight, Col. Jordan was ordered to advance with his regiment and drive the enemy into position. As Jordan moved out skirmishing opened, and every moment became heavier. At the hills in front of the station the enemy made a determined stand, but the First Battalion, under Lieut.-Col. Savage, and the Second, under Maj. Detweiler, by a most gallant charge, drove him from his position and held the ground until the infantry had formed and advanced to their relief. This action proved disastrous to the Union arms, and Col. Coburn, with three thousand eight hundred infantry, was captured. Col. Jordan, with the cavalry, fought his way back to Franklin, bringing off two hundred and twenty prisoners, together with the entire artillery and baggage-train of the army and all the wounded that the ambulances could bear. For the heroic part borne by the regiment in this action it was mentioned honorably in special orders by Gen. Rosecrans.

In the campaign against Bragg in Tennessee, which culminated in the battle of Chickamauga, the regiment took part, and with the First Brigade, First Division of the cavalry, under Gen. Stanley, led the advance of our army. In the initial movements it fought in the battles of Rover, Middletown, and Shelbyville, and at the latter place charged the left flank of the enemy, while the Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry charged the centre, and in a most stubborn hand-to-hand encounter succeeded in capturing nearly a thousand prisoners, with the enemy's battery, breaking up entirely his cavalry organization, and driving the few who escaped as mere fugitives upon the main force at Tullahoma. Among the killed was Capt. Gilbert Waters. It also participated in the action at Elk River, and by passing the stream above the right flank of the enemy and boldly attacking him, forced him from his position at the fords in front of Gen. Turchin, enabling his command to pass the river and follow the retreating columns. At Cowan, a few days later, near the foot of the Cumberland Mountains, the regiment captured two hundred of the rear-guard of Bragg as he was passing. A few days previous to the battle of Chickamauga it penetrated to a point near Lafayette, Ga., and captured by a gallant charge a part of the advance guard of Gen. Longstreet, then marching from the army of Lee in Virginia to reinforce Bragg, and was thus enabled to give Rosecrans the first positive information of Longstreet's presence. At Chickamauga the regiment held the right of our line, and after the defeat of McCook's corps closed on the right of Gen. Thomas, and defended his flank during the remainder of the battle. For its conduct in this desperate encounter it received from Gen. Thomas a complimentary notice, and Col. Jordan was commended for his gallantry in the most flattering terms.

During the winter of 1863 and spring of 1864 it was in East Tennessee, and fought in the battles of Dandridge, New Market, Mossy Creek, and Fair Garden, capturing at the latter place the artillery of the enemy. The regiment having re-enlisted was given a furlough of thirty days, and returned to Pennsylvania early in April. By the latter part of May it was again in the field at Louisville, having recruited its thinned ranks in the mean time to twelve hundred men. While at Louisville receiving arms and horses, Gen. John H. Morgan made his last raid into Kentucky, and was pushing for Frankfort, at which place he designed crossing the Kentucky River, and then by overpowering the detachments scattered along the Louisville and Nashville Railroad as guard, breaking up the track and burning the bridges, cut off Sherman, who was then far on his march to Atlanta, from his base of supplies, and compel him to fall back to Chattanooga. Col. Jordan at once volunteered to defend Frankfort, and seizing all the horses necessary to mount his command, and arming his men with common muskets, he marched by night to the capital, fifty-four miles, and successfully held the place, compelling Morgan to abandon his well-laid scheme, and fall back towards Pound Gap, near which place he was badly defeated by General Burbridge, who had a division of cavalry in his rear.

The regiment soon after marched to Nashville, and thence to Chattanooga, arriving on the 2d of September. Here it was ascertained that the rebel Gen. Wheeler was crossing the mountains into Middle Tennessee, with all his cavalry. By order of Gen. J. B. Steedman, then in command at Chattanooga, the regiment at once started in pursuit, crossing the mountains direct to McMinnville, thence to Murfreesborough, where it arrived on the 5th. On the morning of the 6th it marched out twelve miles on the Woodbury and McMinnville Road to Readyville, where it attacked and utterly defeated Gen. Dibbell's brigade of Wheeler's command, taking two hundred and ninety-four prisoners, a large proportion of whom were wounded with sabre cuts. The charge in this action was led by Maj. D. H. Kimmel, in a most gallant manner. The next day by order received by telegraph from Gen. Thomas, Col. Jordan was placed in command of all the cavalry in Tennessee, and directed to pursue the retreating enemy. He marched the same afternoon, and at Woodbury, just at dusk, met and defeated a part of the rebel Gen. Williams' division, under Col. Anderson. On the following morning he continued the pursuit to McMinnville, and the day following to Sparta, Gen. Williams constantly avoiding an action, though he had more than double the force under Col. Jordan. At Sparta the enemy took to the mountains and passed into East Tennessee. For his conduct in refusing to fight, Gen. Williams was placed under arrest by Gen. Wheeler, from which he was not released until the end of the war. In acknowledgment of the good conduct of Col. Jordan and the troops under his command, of which the Ninth Pennsylvania constituted two-thirds, complimentary orders were issued by Gen. Van Cleve, at Murfreesborough, Gen. Milroy, at Tullahoma, and Gen. Steedman, at Chattanooga.

The regiment then marched to join Gen. Sherman at Marietta, Ga., and on the 14th of November started on its march with that great chieftain to the sea. Previous to moving it was assigned to the First Brigade, Third Division of Cavalry, the whole under command of Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, and was assigned to the right wing of the army under Gen. Howard, leading his advance to Macon and Milledgeville. On the 16th, the first day out from Atlanta, it encountered Gen. Wheeler, who with his cavalry occupied the old works of the enemy at Lovejoy Station, on the Macon Railroad. The position was a formidable one, having been well intrenched by Gen. Hood. As the brigade moved to the attack the enemy opened a galling fire from four guns, but after a short and sharp encounter, by a most gallant charge, the regiment gained a lodgment in the works, driving the enemy from his guns and capturing them with more than three hundred prisoners. The guns were at once manned by the regiment, and were retained by it until the end of the war. They were the same guns that had been surrendered to the superior forces of the enemy near Macon by Gen. Stoneman some months previous.

Early in December, while marching on Macon, it skirmished heavily with the enemy, and with the brigade pushed the cavalry of Wheeler within the defenses of the city. On the day following, in conjunction with Walcott's brigade of Wood's division, Fifteenth Corps, it fought in the battle of Bear Creek or Griswoldville, defeating Wheeler, but not without severe loss, having ninety-five men killed and wounded. Moving through Milledgeville to the left flank of our army, it demonstrated in the direction of Augusta, and after crossing the Ogeechee at the falls turned southeast towards Millen, one of the prison-pens for Union soldiers. When within one day's march of Waynesborough, Wheeler made a sudden night attack, but was defeated, though he followed up the command closely to Waynesborough, where he again made a fruitless night attack. On the day following, it having been discovered that the Union prisoners had been removed from Millen, and the necessity for proceeding farther in this direction obviated, the command turned toward Louisville, Ga., to form a junction with Gen. Baird's division of infantry, which would cross the Ogeechee at that point. During the day Wheeler followed closely, and at Buckhead Creek made a heavy attack upon the Ninth, which was in the rear, in the hope of cutting it off from the rest of the column already across the stream. By a bold charge the enemy was beaten off, and the regiment was enabled to join the remainder of the command, now in line of battle and awaiting attack. It had scarcely gained its position when the enemy advanced, but was met with such a galling fire that he was compelled to draw off, and the brigade marched on unmolested to Louisville. In all these engagements Wheeler's cavalry outnumbered that opposed to him.

Two days later, the infantry having come up, it again moved on Waynesborough. Gen. Dibberel's division of Wheeler's cavalry was found in line of battle at Buckhead Church and defeated. Pushing forward from its camp at Waynesborough, where it remained one day, the command on the following morning again attacked Wheeler, who had barricaded himself within cannon-shot of our front. The Ninth Pennsylvania had the centre, while the Ninth Ohio was on the right and the Fifth Ohio on the left, with the Third and Fifth Kentucky and Eighth Indiana in reserve. In this order the command moved over a beautifully undulating plain, and in twenty minutes the barricades were stormed and Wheeler was in full retreat. At Waynesborough he again made a stand, and after a severe action he was driven from the town, and retreated across Brier Creek, on the road leading to Augusta. On the same day the command faced towards Savannah, where it arrived with the whole army on the 21st of December.

After a month's delay the regiment again took the field, and entering South Carolina at Sister's Ferry marched through Robertsville and Barnwell to Blackville, on the Charleston and Augusta Railroad, where it encountered and defeated a portion of Wheeler's command, and following the railroad towards Augusta, two days later, developed the strength and position of the enemy at Polecat Ponds, near Aiken, where he had been reinforced by Hampton's division. On the day following Wheeler and Hampton attacked with their whole force, but were signally defeated. Without pausing, the brigade moved towards Columbia, the capital of the State, and after taking Lexington and capturing a portion of Wheeler's rearguard, moved in the direction of Charlotte, N. C., as far as Black Stake's Station, on the Columbia and Charlotte Railroad, where it met and defeated a force of the enemy. Crossing the Catawba at Rocky Mount, and marching thence by Lancaster and Chesterfield Court-House, it entered North Carolina, crossing the Great Pedee River near the southern line of the State, and occupied Rockingham. On the morning of the 11th of March the command reached Fayetteville, the enemy retiring, skirmishing slightly. After a few days of rest it moved towards Goldsborough, and on the 16th, at Averyborough, was engaged in a most determined action, lasting from six in the morning until two in the afternoon, against a division of the rebel army led by McLaws, which resulted in the capture of a large number of prisoners, with Gen. Rhett of the First Brigade South Carolina Heavy Artillery. In this action Capt. E. A. Hancock of the Ninth lost a leg, and Capt. John Boal was killed, and in the brigade every twelfth man was killed or wounded. The infantry coming up took up the fighting and carried the rebel breastworks, capturing the artillery and a large number of prisoners. In February Col. Jordan was promoted to brigadier-general, the command of the regiment still resting with Lient.-Col. Kimmel, who had been promoted to that rank in September previous.

On the 17th the command marched toward Bentonville, on the left flank of the Twentieth Corps, and with it participated in the battle which ensued on the 19th, the cavalry assisting materially in securing a triumph on that hotly-contested field. After refitting and resting near Goldsborough, the cavalry on the 9th of April again took the field, and while the infantry moved directly on Johnston's position at Smithfield, it moved by a more circuitous route by the old battlefield of Bentonville, to reach the rear of the enemy and capture Raleigh. To accomplish this purpose required constant marching day and night. On the morning of the second day the cavalry struck the head of the enemy's retreating columns, and after a fierce and sanguinary conflict compelled the enemy to march by the flank, between Raleigh and Neuse River, towards Hillsborough. In this action Asst.-Surg. James Moore was wounded in the left lung while gallantly assisting by his presence in urging on the men.

On the morning of the 13th the First Brigade, under Gen. Jordan, entered Raleigh, the city having been surrendered promptly by the civil authorities on his approach. Passing through the city the enemy under Wheeler and Hampton was found in position on the Hillsborough road, and was immediately attacked. In the engagement which ensued the Ninth bore the brunt of the action. The enemy fell back, hotly pursued by the cavalry for ten miles, to Morrisville, where he again made a stand. The line was quickly formed, the charge sounded, and the position carried, the enemy retreating in the wildest confusion over the plain, broken into fragments by the plunging fire of the artillery from the heights overlooking the valley. The columns being again formed, started in pursuit, when a flag of truce was discovered approaching. It was received by the Ninth, under which was delivered the letter of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, directed to Gen. Sherman, asking for a meeting to determine the terms of surrender of the army under his command. This was the last fighting done, and the last guns fired in Sherman's command were from the battery of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry. From Morrisville the command marched to Durham, and the escort to Gen. Sherman when he proceeded to the Burnett House to meet Gen. Johnston, and again upon the occasion of agreeing to the terms of surrender, was furnished by this regiment, Maj. John M. Porter being in command. After the surrender the command moved through Greenville to Lexington, where it remained until the 18th of July, when it was mustered out of service. Returning to Harrisburg, it was finally disbanded, and the war-worn veterans retired to their homes and the peaceful avocations of life.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

On the 7th of July, 1862, William W. Jennings, a citizen of Harrisburg, received authority to recruit a regiment for nine months' service. Seven companies, A, B, C, D, F, G, and H, were recruited in Dauphin County, Company E was recruited in Lebanon; I, in Adams and Lebanon; and K, in Lebanon and Schuylkill. The companies rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, when, on the 16th of August, a regimental organization was effected, with the following field-officers:

William W. Jennings, colonel; Henry C. Alleman, lieutenant-colonel; Jeremiah Rohrer, major. Company A was detached from the regiment soon after its organization by order of Gen. Wool, in command of the department, and assigned to provost duty in the city of Harrisburg. Just previous to the expiration of its term of service this company was ordered to Washington, but never rejoined the regiment. The remaining nine companies, eight hundred and sixty-nine strong, broke camp on the 17th and proceeded to Washington. The Peninsula campaign had terminated disastrously, and the legions of Lee were moving down upon Pope in the valley of Virginia. For ten days the regiment was encamped on Arlington Heights with other new regiments. It was brigaded with the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-eighth New Jersey, and the Twenty-seventh Connecticut, and on the 23d assigned to duty in guarding Chain Bridge, where it remained until the opening of winter, Col. Jennings commanding the brigade, and Lieut.-Col. Alleman the regiment.

At the beginning of December, upon the eve of Burnside's movement upon Fredericksburg, Col. Jennings was ordered to proceed with his regiment to Falmouth, where he arrived on the 9th, and was assigned to the Third Brigade,¹ of the Second Division, Second Corps. During the night of the 10th the engineers commenced laying pontoon bridges in front of the town, but before they were completed, the workmen were driven away by the enemy's sharpshooters, concealed in houses along the water's edge. Defeated in his first essay, Burnside ordered up his heavy guns, and opened upon the town. During the bombardment the regiment supported batteries, and when this failed of effect, Burnside called for volunteers to cross in boats and drive out the rebel sharpshooters. A party from Hall's brigade was chosen, among whom were members of the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh, and leaping to the boats, and pulling lustily in the face of a shower of bullets, they succeeded in reaching the opposite shore. After a brief struggle the enemy was driven and the bridge was completed. Hall's brigade was the first to cross, and immediately commenced skirmishing to clear the town. Concealed in houses and coverts, from which they could fire with impunity upon the advancing troops, the rebels clung to their shelter, and by their unerring aim caused grievous slaughter. Capt. William Fox was the first man in the regiment hit, being instantly killed while crossing the river. Half of the town was thus skirmished through, the enemy leaving the houses from one side as the Union troops were entering at the other, when the brigade was ordered to halt and occupy the ground gained, and the columns of Sumner commenced crossing. During the night of the 11th a sergeant and a squad of eleven men were captured and carried prisoners to Richmond. A fierce fire of artillery was opened upon the town on the following morning, and the streets were torn by solid shot; but the brigade held manfully to its work. At a little after noon of the 13th, when repeated attempts to carry the heights in front of the town had failed, Owen's brigade, to which the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh was temporarily attached, was led to the assault. Moving out to the low, open ground to the left of the city, all the while under a fierce fire of artillery in front, and a flank fire from a deflection in the hills to the right, Owen formed his men in line of battle, the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh on the left of the One Hundred and Sixth, and dashed forward to his desperate task. Braver hearts never beat than filled the bosoms of the men in that devoted line. Onward they went over the prostrate forms of the dead and the dying, and up to within seventy-five yards of the enemy's lines. But the storm of deadly missiles was here too terrible to breast, and they dropped prostrate upon the ground, and commenced screening themselves behind the dead bodies of their fallen comrades, with which the whole plain was strewn. To raise a head was instant death. In this perilous position the regiment lay for hours, exposed to a pitiless fire of musketry and artillery, and until night had put an end to the contest, when it was relieved with the brigade, and returned to the town. At the conclusion of the battle it retired to its former camp beyond Falmouth. The loss in the engagement was very severe, being two hundred and fifty-seven killed and wounded. Capt. William Fox and Lieut. James S. Shoemaker were among the killed, and Col. Jennings, Lieut.-Col. Alleman, Adj. A. L. Chayne, Capts. James Henderson and John J. Ball, and Lieuts. James B. Keene, Marcus Novinger, Hudson Denny, Jerome W. Henry, J. W. Dougherty, and William R. Orth, among the wounded, the latter mortally.

The regiment was soon after settled in comfortable quarters, and was employed during the winter in picket and guard duty. On the 27th of April, at the opening of the Chancellorsville campaign, the Second Division, now commanded by Gen. Gibbon, moved out to the front of Fredericksburg, and having laid a pontoon bridge, crossed on the 3d of May. Gibbon was joined in the town by Sedgwick's corps, which had crossed below, and during the night had moved up to the city. An assaulting column was formed, and those frowning heights which had been so successfully defended by the enemy on the previous December were now triumphantly carried, prisoners, small-arms, and guns falling to the hands of the victors. Lieut.-Col. Alleman was wounded in the side and thrown from his horse. The enemy retreated towards Chancellorsville, and was closely followed by Sedgwick as far as Salem Church, where Lee, having turned back from Hooker's front, fell upon and crushed Sedgwick's corps, compelling it to withdraw to the left bank of the Rappahannock by Banks' Ford. In the mean time Gibbon, who had been left to hold Fredericksburg, took position around the city, and commenced throwing up rifle-pits. With no barrier left to oppose him, the enemy pushed forward from his triumph over Sedgwick, and soon made his appearance in Gibbon's front, where sharp skirmishing ensued. His position was held until the morning of the 4th, when, under cover of a dense fog, he recrossed the river. The loss of the regiment in the engagement was fifty-three killed and wounded. Lieut. Jacob R. Knisley was among the killed, and Lieuts. David Hummel, Jr., William P. Carmany, and J. W. Dougherty were among the wounded. The nine months' term of service of the regiment expired on the 14th, and in pursuance of orders it was relieved and returned to Harrisburg, where, two days thereafter, it was mustered out of service. During its brief term of duty at the front, of a little more than five months, it was engaged in two pitched battles unsurpassed in severity, and lost an aggregate of four officers and eighteen men killed, fourteen men who died of wounds, sixteen who died of disease, thirty-eight who were discharged by reason of disability, eleven who were captured, ten officers and one hundred and twenty-two men who were wounded, and three officers who resigned.

In General Orders No. 77, Brig.-Gen. Gibbons, commanding the Second Division of the Second Corps, bears this testimony to the services of the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment:

"HEADQUARTERS SECOND DIVISION, SECOND CORPS.

"NEAR FALMOUTH, VA., May 13, 1863.

"The adjutant-general's office having corrected the date at which the term of the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers expires, and decided after representation made from the headquarters that the time expires on the 14th inst. instead of the 20th inst., the regiment is hereby relieved from all duty with this army and will repair to Harrisburg, Pa., there to be mustered out of service. In hiding farewell to this regiment the general commanding the division recalls with pride and satisfaction that although in it, as well as in several other regiments in the service, a difference of opinion has existed in regard to the expiration of the time of the men, this difference has never interfered with their duty as soldiers, and they can now return to their homes with the proud consciousness of duty well and faithfully performed. Your comrades will be glad to welcome you back to their ranks.

"By command of Brig.-Gen. Gibbons.

"J. P. WOOD,

"Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General."

TWO HUNDRED AND FIRST REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS.

The Two Hundred and First Regiment, composed of men from Dauphin County, except Company K, from Franklin, and detachments from the iron works at Duncannon and Fairview, opposite Harrisburg, who formed part of Company D, was recruited at Harrisburg for one year's service, in compliance with an order of Governor Curtin dated July 29, 1864, issued under the call of the President of the United States of July 18th for five hundred thousand men. Pennsylvania's quota was ten regiments of one thousand men each, and this was the first ready for duty, its ranks having been filled to the maximum strength in less than thirty days. The men rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, where they were organized into companies, clothed, armed, and equipped. A regimental organization was completed on the 29th day of August, with the following officers: F. Asbury Awl, colonel; J. Wesley Awl, who had recruited Company B, lieutenant-colonel; and John T. Morgan, who had recruited Company D, major. The field-officers had already been in the service, Col. F. Asbury Awl as adjutant of the Eleventh and captain in the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh; Lieut.-Col. J. Wesley Awl as lieutenant in the First and captain in the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh; and Maj. John T. Morgan as lieutenant in the One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Pennsylvania Regiment, and large numbers of the line-officers and enlisted men had previously been in the field.

On the 29th day of August, 1864, the regiment proceeded to Chambersburg with orders to report to Maj.-Gen. Couch, commanding Department of the Susquehanna, and went into camp five miles from the town, near the point where the pike crosses Back Creek. On the 1st of September Company B was ordered to Carrick Furnace, in Path Valley, and Company F to the mountain road leading from Fannettsburg to Burnt Cabins, and employed in erecting a line of works as a protection against an expected rebel raid across the mountain. On the 14th of September the regiment, with the Keystone Battery, marched through St. Thomas, Bridgeport, Cashtown, and Ruth Corner for exercise. On the 17th of September Company H, Capt. Ashenfelter, was sent to York, Pa., where it remained on duty at the United States General Hospital until the 21st of October, when it rejoined the regiment at Gainsville, Va. The same day Company F, Capt. Maloney, and Company G, Capt. Ensminger, under command of Maj. John T. Morgan, marched from camp near Back Creek to Bloody Run, Pa., with orders to report to Brig.-Gen. O. T. Ferry, commanding the Juniata District; Assistant Surgeon John H. McCreary accompanied the battalion. Shortly afterwards Company F was stationed at McConnellsburg, Pa. During the succeeding fall and winter these two companies were employed in the disagreeable and dangerous, but arduous, duty of arresting deserters, nearly five hundred being apprehended and sent to the front. The companies were mounted to assist them in the performance of the duty assigned. In December, Gen. Ferry being relieved, Maj. Morgan was placed in command of the Juniata District. These Companies F, G, and H never rejoined the regiment until ordered to Harrisburg for muster out.

On the 18th of September, Company C, Capt. McNally, was sent to Scranton, Pa., with orders to report to the provost-marshal of the Twelfth Congressional District.

On the 22d of September, Col. F. A. Awl was placed in command of the United States troops encamped near Back Creek, and on the following day they (the Keystone Battery, Patapsco Guard, Maryland Volunteers, First Battalion One Hundred Days' Pennsylvania Volunteers, the Two Hundred and Second Regiment, and the Two Hundred and First Regiment) marched to Loudoun, Cove Gap, and Camp Hill, by way of Mercersburg and Shimpstown, Upton, and Greencastle, to Marshall roads, and back to camp. The regiment was regularly drilled at this camp, and an officers' school established, to which non-commissioned officers were admitted for tactical instruction. It was largely attended, and had beneficial results. On the 28th of September the six companies of the regiment were ordered to Greene County, Pa., where trouble was anticipated, arising from resistance to the draft then being made, and had proceeded on its way as far as Huntingdon, when it was met by orders to return to Washington, D. C., and report to Maj.-Gen. C. C. Augur, commanding Department of Washington, for orders. Lieut.-Col. J. W. Awl, in connection with his duties as president of a general court-martial, was placed in command of the troops near Chambersburg.

The regiment, having arrived at Washington, was ordered to report to Brig.-Gen. J. P. Slough, Military Governor at Alexandria, Va., and was by him sent to Manassas Junction, Va., where it arrived on the 4th of October, with orders to assist the Two Hundred and Fourth Pennsylvania Regiment, Col. George S. Gallupe, which had been sent out to cover the construction trains, in guarding the Manassas Gap Railroad, its property and trains. Gen. Sheridan had, a short time before, begun his campaign in the Shenandoah Valley, which finally terminated so gloriously at Cedar Creek. This railroad was to be used for the transportation of supplies to the army in the Shenandoah Valley. To keep this line open was of vital importance to the government, to break it up, hinder, and destroy trains the unceasing effort of the disloyal dwellers in the vicinity, aided as they were by Mosby and his guerrillas, who throughout the war had made this locality their favorite line of operations. The regiment had proceeded but a short distance beyond Manassas Junction when the peculiar tactics of the guerrillas became apparent. The train had stopped in the vicinity of a steep embankment for the purpose of putting off a detachment. The night was dark; and just in the middle of the embankment, the train fortunately moving slowly on account of the previous stoppage, the rails were discovered to be removed from the ties for a considerable distance, with the evident intention of wrecking the train with its load of human freight. While the track was being repaired the troops scoured the woods, drove off some guerrillas, who, being mounted, escaped pursuit, and arrested all citizens living in the vicinity.

The favorite pastime of Mosby and his men, aided by the residents, was to waylay trains, throw them from the track when at full headway by the process named, and attack the train and its defenders when in the confusion and distress of the overthrow. The regiment was stretched along the line of this road from Manassas Junction to Thoroughfare Gap, with headquarters at Gainsville. The duty assigned was exceedingly arduous and harassing. If a soldier went outside the lines he was waylaid by skulking guerrillas, constantly on the watch, and suffered either death or captivity. Unceasing watchfulness and activity were essential, while frequent alarms kept every one on the stretch in anticipation of attack. The duty was intensely unpleasant, in constant danger, with scarcely an opportunity of winning honorable distinction, yet was faithfully performed with the loss of but few men. After the complete occupation of the road the secret removal of rails was scarcely probable, but attacks were frequent at selected points, under cover of which the rails were torn up, and thus the moving of trains delayed until repairs were made. These annoyances became so frequent that various expedients were resorted to to check them. The arrest of all citizens living in the vicinity of a raid on the road, or an attack proving ineffectual, the placing of a number of prominent rebel citizens and captured guerrillas upon each moving train proved a thorough protection thereto, and the free rides completely cured the desire to throw trains from the track or fire into them by ambushed guerrillas.

On the 7th of November, 1864, one lieutenant, the regimental commissary-sergeant, several non-commissioned officers and thirty-three privates of Companies E and H, were discharged by order of the War Department. The reason given was that they "had furnished acceptable substitutes." These discharges were peremptory, without desire or previous knowledge on the part of those concerned. The two companies named were largely made up of former employes of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The railroad desired their services, and, failing to secure the voluntary consent of the men, had them peremptorily discharged the service, both commissioned officers and enlisted men. No doubt the railroad company had furnished substitutes.

Shortly after the battle of Cedar Creek the Two Hundred and First Regiment with the others engaged in this guard duty by order fell back to Manassas Junction, tearing up and bringing away with them the material of the road. On the 13th of November the regiment was ordered to Alexandria, Va., relieving at that point the Twelfth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, and the companies of the Two Hundred and Second Pennsylvania on duty in the city. The regiment went into camp at Cattstown, and formed part of the guard in the line of defenses south of the Potomac, besides furnishing train guards on the Orange and Alexandria, and Loudon and Hampshire Railroads, and frequent escorts to detachments of stragglers and deserters forwarded from the camp of distribution to the various armies in the field.

Alexandria at this time contained the military prisons, which were filled with deserters and bounty-jumpers awaiting trial. It also contained the Soldiers' Rest, which was also a camp of distribution, into which all detachments of enlisted men were gathered previous to being forwarded to their regiments in the various armies. The furnishing of escorts to these detachments was part of the duty assigned to the Two Hundred and First. Quite a large number of the officers were detailed as members of the many general courts-martial then sitting at Alexandria for the trial of prisoners collected from the army East and West in the military prisons at that point.

On the 13th of May, 1865, Lieut.-Col. J. Wesley Aul was appointed commandant of the Soldiers' Rest and camp for distribution at Alexandria, in which position he remained until ordered to Harrisburg for muster out with the regiment. On the 24th day of May, 1865, Company G was ordered from Bloody Run, Pa., to Pittsburgh, and placed on provost duty at that point, with Capt. John T. Ensinger as provost-marshal. On the 27th day of May the regiment was ordered to Fort Delaware, Delaware, where it remained on duty until the 16th day of June, 1865, when it was ordered to Harrisburg for muster out. The scattered detachments joined the regiment at that point, and the muster out was completed on the 21st of June, 1865.

CHAPTER XXX.

The War for the Union (continued)—The Militia of 1862—First Regiment—Sixth Regiment—Independent Companies—Twenty-sixth, Thirty-sixth, and Thirty-seventh Regiments.

THE rebel army had no sooner achieved its triumph in the second battle of Bull Run than it hastened northward, and commenced crossing the Potomac. The southern border of Pennsylvania lay in close proximity, all unprotected, and by its rich harvests invited invasion. The Reserve Corps, which was originally organized for the State defense, had been called away to the succor of the hard-pressed army of McClellan upon the Peninsula, and was now upon the weary march, with ranks sadly thinned in the hard-fought battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines' Mill, Charles City Cross-Roads, and the second Bull Run, to again meet the foe, but powerless to avert the threatened danger. The result of the struggle on the plains of Manassas was no sooner known than the helpless condition of the State, which had been apparent from the first, became a subject of alarm. On the 4th of September, Governor Curtin issued a proclamation, calling on the people to arm and prepare for defense. He recommended the immediate formation of companies and regiments throughout the commonwealth, and, for the purpose of drill and instruction, that after 3 p. m. of each day all business houses be closed. On the 10th, the danger having become imminent, the enemy being already in Maryland, he issued a general order, calling on all able-bodied men to enroll immediately for the defense of the State, and to hold themselves in readiness to march upon an hour's notice; to select officers, to provide themselves with such arms as could be obtained, with sixty rounds of ammunition to the man, tendering arms to such as had none, and promising that they should be held for service for such time only as the pressing exigency for State defense should continue. On the following day, acting under authority of the President of the United States, the Governor called for fifty thousand men, directing them to report by telegraph for orders to move, and adding that further calls would be made as the exigencies should require. The people everywhere flew to arms, and moved promptly to the State capital, One regiment and eight companies were sent forward during the night of the 12th, and others followed as fast as they could be organized. On the 14th the head of the Army of the Potomac met the enemy at South Mountain, and hurled him back through its passes, and on the evening of the 16th and day of the 17th a fierce battle was fought at Antietam. In the mean time the militia had rapidly concentrated at Hagerstown and Chambersburg, and Gen. John F. Reynolds, who was at the time commanding a corps in the Army of the Potomac, had assumed command. Fifteen thousand men were pushed forward to Hagerstown and Boonsboro', and a portion of them stood in line of battle in close proximity to the field, in readiness to advance, while the fierce fighting was in progress. Ten thousand more were posted in the vicinity of Greencastle and Chambersburg, and "about twenty-five thousand," says Governor Curtin in his annual message, "were at Harrisburg, on their way to Harrisburg, or in readiness and waiting for transportation to proceed thither." The Twenty-fifth Regiment, under command of Col. Dechert, at the request of Gen. Halleck, was sent to the State of Delaware to guard the Dupont Powder-Mills, whence the National armies were principally supplied. But the enemy was defeated at Antietam, and retreated in confusion across the Potomac. The emergency having passed, the militia regiments were ordered to return to Harrisburg, and in accordance with the conditions on which they had been called into service, they were, on the 24th, mustered out and disbanded. The train on which the Twentieth Regiment was returning over the Cumberland Valley Road collided when nearing Harrisburg, with one passing in the opposite direction, by which four men were killed and thirty injured.

In a letter addressed to Governor Curtin by Gen. McClellan, thanking him for his energetic action in calling out the militia and placing them in the field, the general adds, "Fortunately, circumstances rendered it impossible for the enemy to set foot upon the soil of Pennsylvania, but the moral support rendered to my army by your action was none the less mighty. In the name of my army, and for myself, I again tender to you our acknowledgments for your patriotic course. The manner in which the people of Pennsylvania responded to your call, and hastened to the defense of their frontier, no doubt exercised a great influence upon the enemy." In an order issued by Governor Bradford, of Maryland, soon after the battle, he says, "To Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, and the militia of his State, who rallied with such alacrity at the first symptoms of an invasion, our warmest thanks are also due. The readiness with which they crossed the border and took their stand beside the Maryland bridge show that the border is, in all respects, but an ideal line, and that in such a cause as now unites us Pennsylvania and Maryland are but one."

THE FIRST REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA MILITIA.

The following record of the campaign of the First Regiment Pennsylvania Militia, prepared by a private of Company K, is not only interesting, but worth preservation in this connection:

"With the general history of the struggle our people are familiar. But it has occurred to me, as I read over some old papers, which brought so vividly to mind scenes both tragic and comic connected with the invasion of 1862, that one or two sketches of the incidents of that campaign, gathered from the material before me, might not prove uninteresting, both to those who were participants and to those whose husbands, brothers, and sons went forth when all was uncertainty and gloom, to stand between them and the approaching foe. I know it is common to speak in terms of ridicule of the 'Militia,' and especially is this the case when we have all around us the scarred veterans of the recent conflict, who can tell of battles lost and won, while we can only speak of those that might have been. But there are one or two things to be remembered. In the first place, we were raw militia, sent forth without training or experience, to be brought into collision, if needs be, with Lee's skilled veterans, flushed with their recent success at the second Bull Run. In the second place, the first regiment, of which the Harriburg companies formed a part, was sent down the valley alone, almost to the rebel lines, just before the battle of South Mountain, and at a time when neither Governor Curtin nor Gen. McClellan had any idea of the numbers of the enemy, or how far they had penetrated towards Chambersburg. The truth was that Longstreet's division was lying this side of Hagerstown on the Sunday morning when the cars landed us about two and a half miles beyond Chambersburg. It is very pleasant now to crack jokes at the expense of the militia, and make light of their perils and services in that brief campaign, but it was anything but a joke then, to men who were leaving families and homes with the possibility that they might be shot down upon the border, or perhaps captured en masse and consigned to the tender mercies of a Southern prison. We have since learned what kind of a fate that would have been.

"Said a gentleman of Hagerstown to the writer a year after the invasion of 1862, 'You Pennsylvania militia had no idea of the danger you were in when here, and it was well you had not;' and then he spoke of the fact, well known to the people there at that time, that a considerable rebel force had crossed the river on the night after the battle of Antietam, and were within a short distance of our lines. Had they known we were raw militia they would probably have captured us all. But, lastly, the facts to be mentioned have a local interest, and the narration is intended only for local readers; so without further apology I proceed. And I cannot better introduce my journal than by the following extract from Governor Curtin's message to the Legislature of 1863:

"In the month of September, 1862, after the second disaster at Bull Run, it became evident that the enemy had adopted an aggressive policy, and was about to invade the Northern States through Maryland and the southern border of Pennsylvania. Under the sanction of the President of the United States, on the 11th day of that month, I issued my proclamation, calling into immediate service fifty thousand of the freemen of this State. Under this call twenty-five regiments and four companies of infantry, fourteen unattached companies of cavalry, and four batteries of artillery were immediately organized and sent to the border, the greater portion advancing beyond the State line into Maryland. Gen. John F. Reynolds, at that period commanding the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, was temporarily assigned by the Secretary of War to the command of these troops, by whose order they were returned to Pennsylvania, and by my proclamation disbanded on the 24th of the same month. In acknowledgment of the services rendered by the men of Pennsylvania, Maj.-Gen. McClellan, commanding the Army of the Potomac, by letter dated the 27th of September, 1862, acknowledging the service and thanking the State, uses the following language:

"The manner in which the people of Pennsylvania responded to your call, and hastened to the defense of their frontier, no doubt exercised a great influence upon the enemy;" and the Governor of Maryland, His Excellency A. W. Bradford, in an order dated September 29, 1862, used the following language in regard to these troops: "The readiness with which they crossed the border and took their stand beside the Maryland brigade, shows that the border is in all respects but an ideal line, and that in such a cause as now unites us, Pennsylvania and Maryland are but one."

"The proclamation of which the Governor speaks had been expected for some time. Rumors of coming danger filled the air, and for a week or ten days companies had been organized in most of the wards of the city, and every afternoon was spent in drilling. But when the order to march finally came, it was found that a good many of the incipient soldiers belonged to the Home Guard of which we read, who resolved 'never to leave their homes except in case of an invasion.' In one of the wards, where two full companies had been drilling for a week, so many were missing when the arms were distributed that the two had to be consolidated, and thus one full company was formed.

"The proclamation was read to the companies at the close of drill on Thursday, Sept. 11, 1862. On Friday they were ordered to be ready to start to Chambersburg at short notice, and the same afternoon they were marched to the arsenal and supplied with haversacks and canteens, and afterwards with muskets. The company to which the writer was attached was for some reason furnished with minies, while the others were armed with the old style of muskets, shooting buckshot and ball. On Saturday morning the regiment was organized, made up of three companies from Harriburg and the remainder from different points in the Cumberland Valley. After being kept in the capitol yard the whole day, we were marched about half-past five o'clock in the evening to the round-house and there embarked in freight-cars for Chambersburg. As we proceeded down the valley we took in companies at Shiremanstown, Mechaicoburg, Carlisle, and other points, so that by the time we reached Chambersburg the regiment was full.

"We arrived in the vicinity of the town about midnight. Some of us, wearied with the tediousness of the journey, had innocently imagined that we should be quartered in some comfortable building for the night, and thus get at least a few hours of sleep. But alas for our expectations! After a brief delay the order was given to move on, and creeping around the town we were pushed out on the Franklin Railroad some two miles towards Hagerstown, and at length halted at the edge of a piece of woodland. The moment the train stopped cartridges were distributed and the men ordered to load their muskets and keep perfectly quiet. The prospect was not a pleasant one. We knew but little of the situation. Whether the rebel forces were within one mile or twenty of us was very uncertain, and the orders which had just been issued were not calculated to allay the excitement. If a volley had suddenly been poured in upon us or a troop of cavalry had surrounded the train and demanded our surrender we would not have been much surprised.

"But neither happened, and as the night wore on, the men assumed various recumbent postures and tried to get a little sleep. This was by no means easy. Neither the seats nor the floor of the cars were very soft, and the night was quite cold. The writer has a distinct recollection of seeing one of the editorial fraternity of the city rolling over the floor as if trying to find a soft place, groaning in spirit, and occasionally knocking his head against the butt of a loaded musket to the imminent peril of those whom the muzzle might hit if it fell. The reader, if a veteran, will excuse us. It was our 'first night out,' and we hadn't got used to it yet. We learned a little afterwards.

"But morning at length came, and with it the idea of breakfast. It opened gloomily, and with signs of the coming equinoctial. It was a strange Sunday to many of us. We heard the church bells ringing in Chambersburg, but we could not attend. All day long the boys were busy in erecting booths made of fence-rails, covered in with branches of trees, straw, &c., and by afternoon they had prepared a very comfortable shelter. About eleven o'clock we were furnished with breakfast—beef and bread, and an abominable delectation called 'dandelion' coffee. We can pardon the State authorities for providing this latter, considering the exigency; but we don't want any more of it. To do them justice, they afterwards furnished the genuine article.

"In the evening the regiment had its first dress parade in an open field adjoining the camp. The officers told us, by way of encouragement, that we performed exceedingly well for raw men, even though the muskets didn't all move together, and the 'orderlies' did get a little mixed up in coming to the front. It was observed by some of the men that our colonel, as he stood in front of the line with his arms folded, looked very much like the pictures of the 'Little Corporal.' As darkness came down upon us the camp-fires were lit, and at nine o'clock the drum-beat summoned us to repose. We laid us down beneath the shelters erected, some of us to sleep, others, to whom the whole scene was so novel and strange that it banished slumber, to pass a weary and wakeful night. During the day we had several times heard the distant report of artillery, and we knew not what the morrow might bring forth. We afterwards learned that we were listening to the sounds of the conflict at South Mountain.

"Monday and Tuesday, September 15th and 16th, were passed on the ground on which we first encamped, which was named 'Camp McClure.' Part of each day was spent in drilling by squads, companies, and in battalion. Our camp was bounded on one side by the railroad, and on the other by the turnpike leading to Chambersburg. Towards noon on Monday we were roused by the shouts of the guards on the turnpike side of the woods, and a rush was made by the men to discover the cause of the excitement. We found that it arose from the passage along the road towards the town of a considerable number of ammunition wagons which had been captured from Longstreet's division of the rebel army by a party of Illinois cavalry, who were retreating from Harper's Ferry. Some of the wagons were driven by 'contrabands,' whose grins of delight, in view of their capture by Federal troops, were unmistakable. On the afternoon of the same day Capt. Byers' company of cavalry from Harrisburg passed by our camp on their way to Greencastle and Williamsport.

"On Tuesday some of us got leave to go into Chambersburg, where the luxury of a good wash and a good dinner at the 'Franklin Hotel' was something we fully appreciated. That evening the regiment received orders to make a forward movement early the next morning.

"Wednesday, the 17th, dawned upon us with a murky atmosphere and a drizzly rain. The regiment was formed into line about eight a.m., and marched about a mile and a half on the road towards Greencastle. Here we encamped anew, and supposing that we were to remain for a season, the men turned in and built new shelter-booths, levying contributions for that purpose upon the neighboring fences, and cutting boughs and gathering straw wherever it could be found.

"By this time other regiments of militia had been organized at Harrisburg, and pushed forward into the valley, and they were scattered around us at points not very far distant. Shortly after we reached our new camp-ground a Philadelphia regiment passed us, one of whose officers, after taking a survey of the booths which had been erected by our own men, astonished the writer by inquiring whether we were not going to build some for them also. He was politely informed that in this matter each regiment looked out for itself, and that there were still 'a few more fences left' to which they could have recourse. This turned out to be a memorable day in the history of the war. From an early hour in the morning we were conscious that a great battle was raging somewhere south of us. All day long the smothered roll of artillery could be heard, like distant thunder, and the men were gathered in groups at the edge of the woods, listening to the sounds of the conflict and anxiously speculating as to the result. It was the day of Antietam, and although we knew it not, the destinies of the country were for a time suspended upon the issue of the struggle. Our feelings were peculiar. Out of sight, but within hearing of one of the decisive battles of the war, and yet utterly uncertain whether our own or the rebel flag would be triumphant at its close. Had McClellan's army been defeated, we lay right in the pathway of the advancing foe, who would of course cross the border and push down the valley. What could a few thousands of raw militia do to stop his progress and save our homes? It was not until the next morning that the cheering news of McClellan's victory reached us.

"On Wednesday afternoon we were ordered to pull stakes and march to a new camp-ground, where, fortunately for us, we found very comfortable booths awaiting us, which had been built and then deserted, as ours were, by another regiment. Here we received orders to prepare rations and be ready to move early the next morning. To what point we were not told, but the rumor was—and it afterwards proved correct—that we were to march to Hagerstown. In the morning we were roused at 4 a.m., and told to get everything ready, as we would start at daylight; but the sun rose and the day wore on, and still we tarried, hearing every hour fresh rumors from Gen. McClellan's army. The rebels were said to be badly whipped, and yet it seemed to be understood that the presence of the militia was needed in that quarter for some purpose or other. What that purpose was could only be conjectured, but various were the surmises of the sapient ones among us. One suggestion, which was met with a storm of indignation, was that we were to be detailed to assist in burying the dead on the Antietam battle-field. Another learned gentleman entertained his hearers by describing a sort of net into which the rebels had been driven by McClellan, the aforesaid net having but a single outlet, and that outlet we were to guard.

"One thing, however, was certain, and that was that we were to enter Maryland; and this raised the interesting question whether the Governor, who had called us out to repel a threatened invasion of our own soil, had any right to march us across the border. Many were the opinions pro and con. Some there were who resolutely declared that they would go no further than the Pennsylvania line. But the discussion was brought to a close about four o'clock in the afternoon by shipping us on board a train of cars which carried us rapidly towards the Potomac.

"And so it happened that, without giving us any opportunity of planting our feet firmly upon that line and holding it against the foe, we were shot across it almost before we knew it.

"The regiment reached the camping-ground this side of Hagerstown about eight o'clock in the evening. It was very dark when the train halted, and the first order given was to load our muskets and keep perfectly quiet as we passed through the town, the design apparently being to march us out towards Williamsport. A second order, however, directed us to leave the cars and encamp in the woods for the night. We had stopped in a deep cut, and it was necessary to lay planks from the cars to the top of the bank, on which, with some difficulty, the men clambered up. It had rained heavily during the day, and the ground was very wet. But worse than that was in store for us. We found ourselves on the camp-ground which had been occupied on the previous Sunday by Longstreet's division of the rebel army, who had left it in a perfectly filthy condition. It was hard to find a clean spot to sit or lie down upon. But the darkness was soon dissipated to some extent by the camp-fires of the regiment, and after a hasty supper the men wrapped themselves in their blankets and stretched themselves upon the wet ground with their feet to the fires. It was the first night since we encamped at Chambersburg that we had not something dry to lie upon and some kind of shelter over us. The writer remembers being on guard that night, and in the intervals of duty trying to find a place to rest on the soft side of a rock, wrapped in a gum blanket.

"Friday morning opened upon us with a clear sky and a cool wind, which, with the aid of the sun, soon dried the ground. About ten o'clock we were startled by the sound of artillery, and a heavy canonading was commenced and kept up for about two hours, apparently some six or eight miles south of us in the direction of the river. The discharges were rapid and continuous, and we could distinctly see the smoke rising in the clear morning atmosphere. Towards noon the regiment was addressed by the colonel, who asked the men if they were willing to go forward towards Williamsport. This was followed by a speech from Governor Curtin urging us to advance towards the river, telling us that he would lead the Pennsylvania troops himself, and would take us into no danger that he would not share with us. The men responded with enthusiastic cheers, and preparations were immediately made for a forward movement. Directly after dinner the regiment, in connection with several others encamped near us, the whole forming a brigade, took up the line of march through Hagerstown, and out on the Williamsport turnpike. About two miles and a half beyond Hagerstown the troops were halted and thrown out upon a ridge of ground cut by the turnpike, and extending to the right and left as far as the eye can see. It was known by the name of 'Brier Hill.' Here a regular line of battle was formed, facing towards the river, and stretching on both sides of the turnpike. In the centre, and right on the pike, a barricade was thrown up, and behind it was planted Miller's Philadelphia battery of light field-pieces. To the right of this battery, and within supporting distance, was stationed the First Regiment. In this position, during Friday night, the troops slept on their arms, and twice in the night an alarm was sounded, and they were roused in anticipation of an attack. There can be no question that a rebel force was between us and the river that night, and it was reported that a small body of cavalry passed very near our lines. In fact, so threatening seemed the danger that Governor Curtin, who was in Hagerstown at the time, was called up at midnight and hurried back in a special train to Chambersburg. If that seemed like deserting the men whom he had led forward, and whose danger he had promised to share, it may be said, by way of apology, that a Pennsylvania Governor would have been too rich a prize to run the risk of capture by the rebels. Had he fallen into their hands, only the end of the war would have seen his return to the North, and his subsequent services would have been lost to the country. What was the design of the rebel troops in crossing the Potomac that night can only be conjectured. Perhaps they were after the Governor, and perhaps after the military stores gathered at Hagerstown. They would hardly have ventured very far from the river with McClellan's army in their rear.

"It was during this afternoon and night that Gen. Reynolds, who had been placed in command of the militia, was first seen by our men. He was not recognized at first, as his 'stars' were concealed by an overcoat, and some rather amusing stories are told of encounters between him and some of the 'irregulars,' of whom the general seemed to have but a poor opinion. The 'boys' had heard of his disparaging remarks, and revenged themselves the next morning, in their own way, when he appeared on the field with Gen. Kenley, of Maryland.

"The night passed away without further disturbance, and Saturday morning dawned with a cloudless sky and a cool atmosphere. The writer, who had been detailed with others to guard and bring up the baggage from the former camp-ground, rejoined the regiment about ten o'clock, and found the troops in the position before described, the line of battle being still kept up, but the men lying down or sitting about and their muskets stacked in the rear. The day was a beautiful one, and if the men had felt any trepidation during the darkness of the night, when the several alarms occurred, it had all passed away, and the brightness of the morning and the exhilarating atmosphere had given them new courage. The position occupied by our troops was quite an elevated one, and the view from it in either direction very pretty. In the rear you looked back upon Hagerstown, distant a couple of miles, and in front, not much farther off, are the hills which border the valley of the Potomac. It is a fact worthy of mention here, that on this same ridge Gen. Lee intrenched himself the following summer, on his retreat from Gettysburg, to prevent pursuit by Meade, while his troops slowly recrossed the river, then swollen by recent rains. A few months later the writer saw the remains of his rifle-pits and earthworks for cannon, and recognized the spot as the same on which our line was formed in September, 1862.

"While enjoying the beauty of the day and the surroundings, and listening to the chatting of the men about the occurrences of the preceding night, very suddenly the scene changed and a new alarm ran along the lines. Upon the turnpike next us all was bustle and haste. The wagons which had brought up our provisions and ammunition went hurrying back towards Hagerstown at full speed. Carriers went dashing backwards and forwards, the drums beat, and orders immediately reached us to reform the line of battle, somewhat broken in upon, and see that our guns were loaded and in proper condition for service. The men hurriedly grasped their weapons, closed up the line, and some fifty or sixty rounds of cartridges were served out to each. In a few moments Gen. Reynolds, accompanied by Gen. Kenley, of Maryland, came riding along the line, and as they reached the position occupied by our regiment, some of the boys called out, 'Three cheers for Gen. Kenley!' They were given with a will, and the general, pausing for a moment, turned towards the troops, and with a bow of acknowledgment, exclaimed: 'Men of Pennsylvania, I want you to form that line!' Gen. Reynolds slowly rode on, without seeming to notice the incident.

"About this time the Maryland brigade, which had arrived that morning, came marching along the turnpike, in full uniform, with drums beating and colors flying, passed on its front of the line down the turnpike towards the river, and were then thrown out on the extreme left of the line of battle. Their presence was very inspiring, as they were the only portion of the troops who had seen service and looked like regulars. A short time later, while the excitement was still at its height, Company K of the First Regiment, which, as before remarked, was the only company of the regiment armed with militia muskets, was ordered out from the line to be thrown out as skirmishers. Down on to the pike we were marched, out through the barricade, behind which the field battery was stationed, and thence along the road towards the river, perhaps a half a mile, when we passed into a piece of woods skirting the road, and were ordered to deploy and form a skirmish line. The reader, even if a veteran, will readily see that all this looked like an impending fight, and this was our fixed impression. We learned then and there, if nothing more, something of the feeling, often talked of, of a raw recruit just as the battle opens. That hearts beat very rapidly just then and cheeks grew paler cannot be doubted; but the men could not afford to show cowardice in the presence of the thousands who were behind them, and the company marched out to the post assigned them as steadily as though they were on parade. Probably one-half of this company was composed of young men from Harrisburg, under age, and some of them several years below their majority. The writer will be excused for saying that he saw with astonishment the alacrity with which they, especially, moved out to what seemed like a speedy collision with the rebel forces.

"From the position we now occupied we could look back and see the long line of troops drawn out upon the ridge behind us, the Maryland brigade, with its blue uniforms, being conspicuous on the extreme left. We looked and waited anxiously for what should occur next, expecting each moment to hear the first sounds of battle. But we could see nothing in advance of us, and no hostile shot broke the stillness. The day passed on, the excitement gradually subsided, and with the exception of a continual riding of mounted men up and down the turnpike, nothing occurred to renew the alarm. About five o'clock in the afternoon the Philadelphia battery was moved farther up the road, and commenced firing, probably shelling the woods in advance of them. In a little while we saw the old line in our rear breaking up, and the troops marched forward, with their drums beating, passing our skirmish-line, and taking up a new position about a mile nearer the river. No orders were given to us that night to rejoin our regiment, and the company remained where they were until the next morning. The other troops slept on their arms in their new position.

"During Saturday night, as the troops remained in their advanced position, they could see the flash of the rebel cannon across the river and the flight of the shells thrown apparently to this side, though not reaching our lines. On Sunday morning Company K, which, as before stated, had remained in their old position all night, rejoined the regiment about ten o'clock. They were immediately ordered to the extreme front again, and, crossing some corn-fields, reached the brow of a hill some distance to the left of the turnpike. From this point half of the company were deployed and sent out upon the picket line, extending to the left for perhaps half a mile. It was a lovely autumnal morning, and at this time everything was still around us. Sheltered, as we were, in a pleasant woods, some of us were hoping that we might enjoy a quiet Sabbath, free from the excitements of the two preceding days. In a short time, however, one of the advanced pickets came rushing in, in breathless haste, with the tidings that a large force, supposed to be rebels, were advancing along a road which ran in front and to the left of us, leading probably to Williamsport. Clouds of dust had been seen rising along the road, and the force seemed to be composed of cavalry, artillery, and infantry. A messenger was immediately sent to the commanding officer of the troops in our rear, and in a few moments we saw the effects of the news upon the long line which stretched over the fields behind us. The excitement of the day before was renewed. The drums bent and the struggling line assumed a more compact shape.

Presently a number of mounted officers, accompanied by orderlies, rode rapidly past us over the fields, going out to the front of our line of pickets. We waited anxiously for further news, and in a short time they were seen returning, and word passed along the line that the troops advancing, instead of rebels, were Couch's division of McClellan's army, on their way to Williamsport.

"The tidings were very satisfactory, for they not only assured us of the presence of veterans between us and the rebels, but put an end, for the present at least, to the danger of an invasion of Pennsylvania, and allowed us that our brief campaign was ended. Company K was at once ordered to its place in the regiment, and in a short time the regiment itself was in motion on its return march to Pennsylvania. And then began a long and weary tramp which some of us at least thought might have been spared us. Wearied with the exciting scenes of the past forty-eight hours, a quiet rest during the remainder of the Sunday afternoon in some shady spot would have been very grateful to the men, and prepared us for a long march as was needful on Monday. But instead of this we were, without halting, marched back through Hagerstown, and on out on the road leading towards Chambersburg. All the long, hot afternoon the march continued along the dry and dusty road, until about eight o'clock in the evening we reached the vicinity of Greencastle, a distance from our starting-point of about fourteen miles. Here we encamped in an open field near the town, and the wearied men were glad to throw themselves down anywhere to get a little rest and sleep. The writer was so fortunate as to gain admission to a barn adjacent to the camp-ground, where, stretched upon the hay, he enjoyed the best night's rest he had had since the regiment left Harrisburg.

"All day Monday we remained encamped in the open field beneath the burning sun, without even a tree to shield us from its rays. Little shelter-tents were put up during the day, in each of which two or three men could sit or lie down, but not stand erect. The men, however, were allowed to scatter, and many of us went into Greencastle, where we enjoyed the privilege of eating dinner once more at a table. At the nine o'clock drum-beat we turned in, as we supposed for the night, but in about an hour were roused again and ordered to strike tents and march to the cars. At Greencastle we embarked about midnight in freight cars, and started for home. Our progress was very slow, as the road was blocked up with troop- and provision-trains, and just before daylight our train and another collided in the suburbs of Shippensburg, smashing the locomotives and knocking many the men off their seats. The good people of the town were very hospitable, kindly opening their houses to us, and furnishing the entire regiment with a good breakfast.

"The accident detained us until noon, when we started again, and ran as far as Carlisle. Here we were kept waiting until six o'clock in the evening, when the train got in motion once more, dropping companies at Mechanicsburg and Shiremansstown, and about half-past seven the Harrisburg companies were safely landed at the foot of State Street. Here we found quite a crowd awaiting us, who greeted us with cheers, and really seemed glad that we had not been gobbled up by the rebels and carried to Southern prison pens. It was a pleasant thing thus to be welcomed by our fellow-citizens, even though we had shed no blood in their defense, and were returning with unbroken numbers. We had at least helped to maintain the honor of the State, and especially of its capital city, by responding promptly to the call of the Governor and forming part of the first regiment which had gone forth to the border when danger seemed impending. Now that it was all over, and we had safely reached our homes, we probably felt a little self-satisfaction as we looked back upon the events of the past ten days, during part of which we had stood side by side with the Maryland brigade, some ten miles beyond the border. If so, the reader will pardon us, more especially if he be one of those who refused to come at the Governor's call and remained quietly in the security of his home, perhaps to speak jestingly of the Pennsylvania militia."

SIXTH REGIMENT PENNSYLVANIA MILITIA.

From an interesting sketch of the orderly sergeant of Company K we glean the following relating to this command and its service in the war:

"Arriving at Harrisburg, we were enrolled as Company K, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Militia, J. Armstrong, colonel. Some details concerning the organization of the regiment were not completed. Delay was experienced at the arsenal on account of the great rush for arms. We were obliged to await our turn, ordered into quarters, our company in one of the school-houses of the city, where we remained until the morning of the 15th, the patriotic citizens meanwhile taking care that we did not suffer for want of provisions. We made good use of our time drilling, and provided ourselves with rubber and woolen blankets, and other necessities which the State was not prepared to furnish. On the morning of the 15th, about eight o'clock, we were marched to the arsenal, where each soldier received a musket and twenty rounds of ammunition. Immediately after receiving these, the regiment was formed on Fourth Street, in the rear of the capitol, preparatory to marching to the cars, which awaited us on the Cumberland Valley Railroad. Here we stood for the space of an hour or more, holding no communication with the concourse of people which lined the western slope of Capitol Hill, many of whom had come to see us off and bid us a last farewell, but were prevented from approaching by certain sabred veterans on horseback, who galloped incessantly up and down the lines, and who, judging from their fierce countenances, would have decapitated any venturesome spirit daring to cross their path. Many of this throng, particularly the female portion, were weeping, probably at the thought of the terrible fate which awaited those unfortunate rebels who might be called upon to stand against us in battle. Here and there could be discerned the sweet and kindly face of mother, sister, wife, or sweetheart. Their presence cheered us as well as saddened our departure.

"About eleven o'clock we boarded the cars, and were soon on our way to the front. The train was composed of freight-cars of various descriptions, but principally of the box pattern, air-tight everywhere excepting at the two side-doors. Towards evening, September 15th, the train reached Chambersburg, and the soldiers were quartered for the night in various parts of the town, our company with some others in the court-house. Next morning we took up the line of march towards Hagerstown. The weather was very warm and the road dusty. After marching what seemed to us about ten miles, but in reality only three, we arrived at Camp McClure, a beautiful piece of woodland near the road. Here we were halted until the First Regiment, Col. McCormick's, marched out of camp, when the Sixth marched in and took their place. Space was assigned each company, and we were ordered to stack arms and make ourselves as comfortable as circumstances would permit. Macy of the companies found booths already constructed on their grounds, but on the space assigned to Company K there were no improvements. A large force was, therefore, detailed to bring in rails and corn-fodder, and construct a wigwam large enough to accommodate the whole company. The men worked with a will, and before night a very comfortable and spacious wigwam was erected, and the ground within littered with straw obtained from a neighboring barn. In the mean time the cook had prepared supper, and we partook of our first meal of hard-tack, mess-pork, and army coffee. Most of us had never seen hard-tack before, and were at a loss how to manage it. Fortunately our cook and second sergeant had been in the three months' service, and were able to enlighten us.

"The following order, issued soon after we arrived in camp, will serve to show how our time was spent:

"6TH REGT. PA. MILITIA,

"CAMP McCLEURE.

"Captains of the several companies will order squad drill by company from 9.30 to 11.30 A.M.

"Squad drill in the afternoon from 1.30 to 3, and company drill from 3.30 to 5 o'clock. Dress parade at 5.30 P.M.

"Morning reports must be made to these headquarters before 7.30 A.M. daily. By order.

"J. ARMSTRONG,

"Colonel Commanding."

"On the evening of the 16th, Capt. James D. Dougherty's company of artillery arrived in camp, and took position on the low ground along the creek which skirted the edge of the camp. This was a well-appointed company of four guns; several of the officers and some of the men were said to be experienced artillerymen. Their horses, however, were unused to the service, and some of them balky, so that it required considerable skill and much patience to convey the pieces from camp to the drilling-ground on the heights above. We were glad to see this company, for theirs were the only familiar faces in camp since the departure of the First Regiment.

"On the 17th we heard the booming cannon, which continued all day long, and seemingly at no great distance, but we could get no news, yet we felt confident that a great battle was in progress; all else was conjecture and uncertainty. That night, about ten o'clock, the regiment received orders to be ready to march at a moment's notice. Our company was ready, and formed at once in front of the wigwam. We stood in position probably an hour, awaiting orders from headquarters. None came, however, and the captain, who was a humane man, ordered us to break ranks, and each man make himself as comfortable as he could, without unpacking his knapsack. We sat down among the trees, with our guns in our hands, passing a tiresome and sleepless night. Towards morning more definite news of the battle was received, and at daylight the order for a forward movement was countermanded. It was intimated that the emergency was about over, and that the next order would probably be one to go home.

"On the morning of the 23d, we were ordered to the railroad and embarked for home. After a long and tedious ride in freight-cars we reached Harrisburg towards evening, and encamped for the night on Capitol Hill. The next day we 'turned in our guns' (the ammunition having been expended shooting mark in Camp McCleure), and were discharged, having been in the service exactly eleven days."

CHAPTER XXXI.

The Early Courts—Where First Held—The Bar in 1789—The Court-Houses—The President Judges of the County—Reminiscences of the Bar, and Roll of Members.

THE first courts in Dauphin County were held in a log house which stood until about the year 1840 near "the lower ferry," and the record of the first court reads thus:

"At a Court of Quarter Sessions holden near Harris' Ferry, in and for the county of Dauphin, &c.," on the "third Tuesday of May, in the year of our Lord 1785," before "Timothy Green, Samuel Jones and Jonathan McClure, Esqrs., Justices of the same court."

These justices were not "learned in the law," which was the requirement under the Constitution of 1790. The sheriff of Lancaster County exercised the same office in Dauphin County. The names of the attorneys at the bar admitted that day were Stephen Chambers, John Wilkes Kittora, John Clark, Joseph Hubley, John Andre Hanna, James Riddle, John Joseph Henry, Peter Huffnagle, Jacob Hubley, Collinson Reed, George Ross, and John Reily,—quite an array of legal talent, most of whom rose to occupy the highest positions at the bar or in the halls of legislation.

The earliest record of a punishment is the account of one inflicted on William Courtenay and James Lachey, who were sentenced to receive eighteen lashes and pay fifteen shillings sterling, on the 18th of August, 1785, between the hours of four and six o'clock in the afternoon, and to stand in the pillory. This instrument of judicial vengeance stood about sixty yards below the grave of John Harris, the elder, or just above the ferry house, at the junction of Front and Paxtang Streets.

The names of the jurymen were James Cowden (foreman), Robert Montgomery, John Gilchrist, Barefoot Brunson, John Clark, Roan McClure, John Carson, John Wilson, William Crain, Archibald McAllister, Richard Dixon, John Parthemore, James Cronch, Jacob Awl, William Brown, Andrew Stewart, James Rogers, Samuel Stewart, John Cooper, Alexander Berryhill.

Alexander Graydon was the first prothonotary; Anthony Kelker, the first sheriff; and Rudolph Kelker, the first deputy sheriff.

In the Freeman's Journal for March 4, 1789, is the following squib: "From a lawyer who could not attend Dauphin Court to his friend, a lawyer at Harrisburg.

"At Dauphin Court, tho' fond of sport,
The prospect is so barren.
I can't attend, my dearest friend,
Where there's more crow than carrion.
"There's Wilkes and Andre, John and Joe,
And Peter, too, so pliant;
If you but flinch and stir a inch
They're sure to nab your client.
"There's Father Smith and Brother Teates,
And little Tom and Stephen,
When one sits down the other prates,
And so they both are even.
"With hooks and crooks and msty books,
Whilst candles waste in sockets,
The court perplex and juries vex,
And pick their client's pockets.
"When Court is out, away they scout,
Sworn enemies to quiet,
Drink wine et Crab's, kiss dirty drabs,
And spend the night in riot."

By reference to the early portion of the roll of practicing attorneys it will readily be seen to whom the stanzas allude.

Among the early cases which came before the court was one for "blasphemy," the first, and perhaps the only, case of trial and conviction for that crime under an old Provincial law. We present the account to show how our ancestors, who were just as tolerant as we, treated blasphemy with proper severity. The foundation of our government and our advancement in civilization rests upon the upholding of the revealed religion of the Christ of Nazareth, and if the law of God is of no avail, the civil law should stretch out its arms and check the headlong career of all blasphemers. We copy the account from the Oracle of Sept. 17, 1799:

"At the Court of Oyer & Terminer, held in this town on the 11th ult., one ———, tobaccoist and fiddler, a man who has a wife and several young children, was convicted on an indictment for BLASPHEMY. In order to give the reader a more perfect idea of the magnitude of the crime, we extract from the indictment the following:

"The Grand Inquest for the body of the county of Dauphin upon their oaths and affirmations respectively do present, that ———, tobaccoist, not having the fear of God in his heart, but being moved and seduced by diabolical instigation, and contriving and intending Almighty God, and our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ to blaspheme and dishonor, the first day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, at the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this Court, in the presence and hearing of divers liege subjects of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, well understanding the English and High Dutch languages, falsely, impiously and blasphemously did say, speak, and with a loud voice pronounce and publish in the High Dutch language, these false, impious and blasphemous words, to wit: 'Christ (our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ meaning) is a . . . If Christ is the Son of God (meaning the Almighty God) then God hath . . .' To the great dishonor and contempt of Almighty God and our Saviour Jesus Christ—to the evil example of all others in like manner offending, contrary to the laws, and the act of General Assembly of this State in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, &c.

"The prisoner being arraigned, plead not guilty, but afterwards retracted his plea and submitted to the Court. Whereupon the Court gave judgment that he pay a fine of £10, for the use of the poor of the county of Dauphin, suffer three months' imprisonment in the jail of said county, and pay the costs of prosecution. The Court also directed that he be bound to keep the peace and be of good behavior to all the liege citizens of the United States for seven years, himself in 400 dls. and one surety in the like sum of 400 dls."

The courts were afterwards held in the old log jail, which stood until recently on the northwest side of Strawberry Alley, a short distance northeast of Raspberry Alley, and also in a log house which formerly stood on the lot now occupied by No. 311, on the east side of Market Street near Dewberry Alley. From 1792 to the year 1799 inclusive were occupied in the construction of the first court-house; at least, the expenditures¹ for the erection thereof cover that period, as we attain from the records in the office of the county commissioners. The old jail was erected about 1790, perchance a year or two earlier, as among the earliest accounts are sums of money paid for the erection of "a stone wall around the goal."

When the capital was removed from Lancaster to Harrisburg the court-house was given up to the uses of the Legislature, by which it was occupied until the completion of the State capitol, on the 2d of January, 1822. During a portion of this period the building now known as the White Hall, on Market Street, was used by the courts until the commissioners of the county erected the brick buildings on the northwest corner of Walnut Street and Raspberry Alley, into which the court moved and which it occupied until the Legislature vacated the old court-house. This building, of which a representation is given, was an antique-looking structure of brick, two stories high, with wings and a semi-rotunda in front, the wholesurmounted with a circular wooden cupola containing a bell. On the grounds of the residence of Rt. Rev.

Bishop Shanahan this cupola can be seen, while on the barn of the Calder estate, adjoining the new reservoir at Harrisburg, is the Indian warrior which surmounted the old cupola. The semi-rotunda was added to the main building by the State at the time of its occupancy by the Legislature, the Senate convening in the main room on the second floor, and the House of Representatives on the first floor. The former room was afterwards used for public meetings, lectures, and by the different religious denominations prior to their permanent organization as a place of worship.

Becoming too small for the different offices, as well for the courts, the building was taken down and the present modern and capacious edifice erected.

In this connection, and as a part of the history of the courts of the county, we give the reminiscences

THE PRESIDENT JUDGES OF DAUPHIN COUNTY.

[As before noted, the following interesting incidents are from the pen of the late George Washington Harris. It will be perceived that he does not refer in this connection to the first president judge learned in the law, William Augustus Atlee.]

"Judge Henry was, I understand, a native of Lancaster County. He was a large man, perhaps above six feet in height, and he was lame from a rheumatic affection, contracted probably when in the military service. He had been in the Revolutionary army, and was in the Quebec expedition in 1775, and subsequently wrote a narrative of that expedition, which is now a scarce book. I do not distinctly recollect of ever seeing him. I know nothing personally of his ability as a judge, but never heard it questioned. He presided, in the year 1798, at the trial of Hauer and McManus for the murder of Francis Sheetz, and from the report of that case I would judge quite favorably of his capacity. He also wrote the will of George Frey for the foundation of the Emans Orphan-House. He died when in Lancaster, Lancaster County forming a part of his judicial district. His family lived in Harrisburg after his death for several years, and several of his daughters were zealous, active members of the Methodist Church.

"The case of Hauer and McManus, as I have intimated, was reported. It was one of the most interesting murder trials which ever took place in the State. It was devised by Hauer for the destruction of the lives of Francis and Peter Sheetz, his brothers-in-law, by whose death he desired his wife to come into possession of a considerable estate. McManus was a young Irishman, who, when executed, was not twenty-one years of age. He had led rather an irregular life in his own country, and was seduced into this outrage through Patrick Donegan, who lived for a time with John Hauer. Donegan and others were also indicted for the murder, but none were convicted but Hauer and McManus.

"A degree of ability was displayed by the counsel in this case which has seldom been equalled at any criminal trial in the interior of this State. Charles Smith, of Lancaster, Charles Hall, of Sumbury, and Matthew Henry, who, I understand, was a brother of Judge Henry, were concerned on the part of the Commonwealth. Thomas Duncau, of Carlisle, afterward Judge Duncau of our Supreme Court, James Hopkins, William Montgomery, of Lancaster, George Clymer, of Reading, who had been a member of the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, and Messrs. Fisher, Elder, and Laird, of Harrisburg, were concerned for various of the prisoners. Messrs. Duncau, Fisher, Elder, Laird, and Clymer were concerned for Hauer.

"A bill had been at first found against John Hauer and Peter McDonough as principals, and against Patrick Donegan, Francis Cox, Hugh McDonough, and Elizabeth Hauer, who was the wife of John Hauer, as accessories before the fact.

"Hauer was put upon trial. It was intended on his trial to use McManus as a witness on the part of the Commonwealth, as he alleged that the murder had been committed by Hauer and Peter McDonough while he held their horses at the end of the lane. But on the trial Hauer sent for the president and Judge Gloninger and made a confession of his guilt as an accessory before the fact, but denied that he was present at the commission of the murder, which he alleged had been committed by McManus and Peter McDonough, and that the rest of the prisoners were accessory before the fact. It appearing probable that McManus was present at the murder and was the person who shot the deceased, he was not examined as a witness on the trial of Hauer. The jury was discharged from giving a verdict as to Hauer and the cases were continued until the next term. In this proceeding the counsel of Hauer declined to interfere as they had not been consulted by Hauer as to his confession, and they considered that he had by that act taken his case out of their hands. At the next term a bill was found against McManus as the person who committed the murder with a pistol or axe, and one against Hauer and others for procuring and abetting it.

"McManus was tried and convicted on his own confession. "When the case of Hauer and others was called up, it was objected by Duncau, Fisher, and Clymer that Hauer was in law discharged, as the jury in his case at the former term had been discharged without his consent, and it was alleged that he could not be put in jeopardy of life twice for the same offense. Able and learned arguments were made by them, and by Mr. Hall and Smith on the part of the Commonwealth. It was contended by them that the proceeding which should bar a second trial must be an actual acquittal by verdict on the general issue (p. 35); and further that there must have been a verdict of not guilty on an indictment free from legal error, and that in this case of Hauer the first indictment was defective, it not having been alleged in it that Francis Sheetz died of the wounds received. Judge Henry held that such omission was fatal to the indictment and was conclusive in the matter; and that it was therefore unnecessary to decide the other question. As Hauer therefore could not have been legally convicted on the first indictment, his case and that of Donegan and Cox was called up. On being called on to plead, Hauer stood mute. The court, considering that he stood mute from obstinacy, directed the plea of not guilty to be entered for him.

"Donegan and Cox objected to being tried with Hauer, but the court decided that the matter was within the discretion of the prosecuting officer, and they were accordingly tried together. The confession of Hauer was used against him, and testimony given as to Donegan and Cox. Hauer was convicted and Donegan and Cox acquitted. A bill was found against the wife of Hauer and Hugh McDonough, but no evidence was given on the part of the Commonwealth and they were acquitted. It would appear to me probable that if Hauer had not made confession of his guilt he would not have been convicted, as the persons present in the room where Francis Sheetz was killed (he was first shot with a pistol and then struck with an axe) could not identify the murderers, they having their faces concealed, and the candle in the room being extinguished by accident.

"The case was another illustration of the saying that 'murder will out.' As observed by Webster in the Crownshield case, the secret is often too deep for concealment and must be confessed. Hauer, in this case, confessed and acknowledged his written confession on being arraigned on the first indictment, but when arraigned on the second indictment he did not speak and never spoke publicly afterwards, and was eventually hanged without publicly speaking a word. However, it is worthy of remark that when the jury were ready to deliver their verdict, and the clerk proclaimed, 'John Hauer, hold up your hand,' he held it up.

"McManus made a confession subsequently, which was published. In this he persisted that he was not present at the house when the murder was committed, but that he held the horse at the end of the lane. He also declared that when Hauer and himself were confined in the same apartment in the jail, Hauer declared that he would behave in such a manner as to induce a belief that he was insane.

"A report of the trial was published by Mr. Wyeth, from which I have made up this statement. Hauer and McManus were executed on Capitol Hill in July, 1798.

"Judge Henry was followed in the judicial office by Walter Franklin, of Lancaster, who was commissioned on the 18th of January, 1811. He lived in Lancaster when appointed by Governor Snyder, and was a man of very gentlemanly appearance. His judicial administration was not satisfactory to the bar in Lancaster County, where he afterwards presided, and when acting as judge in that county at least two attempts were made before the Legislature to effect his removal, either by address or impeachment. On one of those occasions he was defended by James Hopkins, a veteran attorney of Lancaster. During the proceeding one of the managers of the House concluded his address late in the afternoon. Mr. Hopkins rose and asked that the House adjourn till the next day to afford him an opportunity for more special preparation. The House, however, was fatigued with the length of the proceeding and refused to adjourn, and Mr. Hopkins, being obliged to proceed, rose and stated that he would divide his proposed argument into a considerable number of heads, and the first head of his argument into various parts. A member immediately rose and moved that the House adjourn in order to afford to the counsel an opportunity to condense, and the House accordingly adjourned.

"On the first proceeding before the Legislature in his case the judge came off successfully, but on a second or third proceeding it was said that he had written on both sides of some political question; and this was considered to be so grave an offense, that, fearing a more unfavorable result, the judge resigned.

"In one of the proceedings against Judge Franklin, one of the managers on the part of the House was Andrew Stewart, of Fayette County, who was a candidate for Congress in 1870, against Mr. Foster, the former member, and Mr. Stewart was then the last survivor of the Legislature to which I have referred. On one of the same proceedings, perhaps the same one, against Judge Franklin, my old friend Richard Coulter, afterwards a judge in the Supreme Court, was also a manager on the part of the House. He was frequently poetic in speech and in writing. I recollect one of his figures on the occasion referred to. He said substantially that the judiciary of Pennsylvania should be like the guardian angel of old, standing on the battlements of the Constitution, waving the sword of justice to and fro, to keep corruption from its base.

"As I was on quite friendly terms with Judge Coulter during my appointment as reporter, I desire to be excused for referring in this place to another eloquent passage from one of his judicial opinions. It is in his opinion, in the case of Supple vs. Hansell, reported in 5 Harris Reports, 388-9. An individual granted a piece of ground for the erection of a church and for the use of a burial-ground, reserving the right to him and his wife to build a vault or vaults in it, and to keep the same in repair. Some of the grandchildren had another vault made, appropriating four burial-lots on the ground. This was objected to by the trustees of the church, and the decision of the Supreme Court was adverse to the claim of the defendants in the case.

"Judge Coulter, who delivered the opinion in the case, observed 'there is room yet in the family sepulchre; but if the grandchildren do not like the cold and lonely dampness of that place, but prefer that their narrow house should be visited by the glimpses of the sun and moon, and be fanned by the breezes (and the thoughts and feelings of this life often linger about the grave), they can enjoy that preference by being buried as most other people are buried, and like other members of the church, in the bosom of mother earth, with the green sod over them.'

"The successor of Judge Franklin was Amos Ellmaker. He was born in Earl township, Lancaster Co., on the 2d of February, 1787. After graduating at Princeton, he studied law for one year with James Hopkins, of Lancaster, then a year at the Litchfield Law School, and concluded his studies with Thomas Elder, of this place, whose daughter he married. He was admitted to the bar at December term 1808. He was elected to Congress, but declined to serve, and twice refused a tender of a commission as a judge of the Supreme Court. He continued in the practice of the law at Harrisburg until his removal to Lancaster, in June, 1821. He went to Baltimore in the year 1814 as an aid to Gen. Forster. He was commissioned as judge in July, 1815, and occupied the bench till December, 1816. He was reputed to be a good lawyer. His addresses to the jury, when at the bar, were clear, distinct, and argumentative, but by no means oratorical. He left the bench in December, 1816, for what reason I do not know. He held an elevated position here, and was appointed attorney-general by Governor Findlay. He, however, contracted the odium of the Governor's friends by refusing to defend him before the Legislature, when unjustly assailed by a Philadelphia faction, headed by the celebrated John Binns. This refusal may have been owing to the fact that Mr. Thomas Elder, his father-in-law, was one of those who urged the prosecution.

"The Governor was defended by George M. Dallas, of Philadelphia. The chairman of the committee of the House was William Wilkins, of Pittsburgh, who made a report favorable to Governor Findlay. Mr. Wilkins was afterwards rewarded for his action by appointment as a judge in the Pittsburgh district, to fill a vacancy, opportunely for him, happening through the death of Judge Roberts, a few days, perhaps within two days, before the termination of Governor Findlay's official term. He was appointed on the 18th of December, 1820, Mr. Findlay having been inaugurated on the 16th of December, 1817, his executive term being for three years.

"Mr. Ellmaker, as before observed, afterwards removed to Lancaster, and was, after the lapse of some years, a candidate for the Vice Presidency, on the ticket with the celebrated William Wirt. He died in November, 1851.

"Mr. Ellmaker was succeeded as judge by David Scott, who was appointed by Governor Snyder, and was commissioned in December, 1816. He was a native of New England, but was settled in Bradford County at the time of his appointment. He is said to have been a good lawyer. He is also said to have been pugnacious in his temper. I have heard it observed that if he had been in military life he would most probably have been distinguished. I have no recollection of ever seeing him on the bench, but saw him after he had left Harrisburg as his place of residence, and when I saw him he was somewhat deaf. He resigned his position as judge of this district, having been appointed to another district in the northern part of the State.

"Knowing little of Judge Scott, I addressed Judge Woodward, late of our Supreme Court, for information as to him.

"Judge Woodward states that Judge Scott was a native of Connecticut, and that he settled in Bradford County. When Judge Scott was appointed to this judicial district, Judge Gibson was the president judge in the Bradford District, to which he had been appointed by Governor Snyder. A vacancy happening on the Supreme Bench, Judge Gibson was appointed by Governor Snyder as a supreme judge, and Judge Burnside was appointed to the Bradford district, then consisting of the counties of Luzerne, Pike, Wayne, Susquehanna, and Bradford. Judge Burnside, after presiding in that district for above a year, resigned, and Judge Scott was appointed, the district having been reduced to the counties of Luzerne, Pike, and Wayne. Judge Woodward states that Judge Scott presided in that district with great ability until the year 1838, when in consequence of increasing deafness he resigned in favor of Nathaniel B. Eldred; but Governor Ritner appointed Judge Jessup instead of Mr. Eldred. Judge Scott lived several years afterwards, and died at Wilkes-Barre. Judge Woodward states that Judge Scott while on the bench also acted as canal commissioner for several years, but without compensation; and Judge Woodward further writes that Judge Scott was a man of great clearness and force of intellect. He had not been thoroughly educated either in literature or law, but he supplied his deficiencies by application and force of character. He was an honest, upright judge, a little overbearing sometimes, and always of irascible temper; and on the whole an excellent officer both as judge and canal commissioner. He was the founder of the Episcopal Church in Wilkes-Barre, and instituted in his office there the first Sunday-school that was organized in northeastern Pennsylvania.

"Samuel D. Franks and George B. Porter, the first of Reading, and the latter of Lancaster, had been in the military service, having gone to Baltimore in 1814, when it was threatened by the British forces. They were not engaged in any battle, but when the Legislature met, after the Pennsylvania forces, volunteers and militia, had returned home, the two came to Harrisburg, and both clerks of the House, as I think, not having gone into the military service, they were elected clerk and assistant clerk of the House of Representatives. They were efficient officers, and Franks was an excellent reader. He was useful to the members and was quite popular. It was unfortunate for him that he did not continue in that position; but after the election of Mr. Findlay as Governor he applied for appointment as judge, that being at that time an appointment during good behavior. He was possessed of considerable talent, and it was supposed that with industry he might make a respectable judge, and unfortunately he was appointed. He was an amusing companion. He had considerable talent for mimicry, and if he had adopted the stage as his pursuit in life he probably would have been distinguished as a comic actor. He was possessed of much humor, and abounded in anecdotes. I have heard of one told by him relative to a charge by an associate judge to a jury in Lehigh County. A man was on trial before the associate judges for some offense. The evidence did not show him to be guilty, but the judge charged the jury that though the case was doubtful they might as well convict the defendant, for that there had been a great deal of rascality about there lately.

"I have also heard that he was called on for a toast on an agricultural occasion at Philadelphia, and that he gave as a sentiment, 'Agricultural societies; the Empire of American Industry and the Bull-work of National Independence.'

"He was a large man, with a large head; and though not handsome, yet had a fine face. He had a large Grecian nose, a florid countenance, and red hair. He said he was the best red (or red) judge in Pennsylvania. But the law as a science had few charms for him. The business of the court languished excessively while he was in office, perhaps not more than twenty verdicts being taken in a year. The younger members of the bar, of whom I was one, suffered in consequence, and after two attempts before the Legislature we succeeded in having him displaced. He resigned when the second proceeding was in progress. I recollect of one argument which took place before him which excited considerable interest at the time.

"A person in Harrisburg who had been largely engaged in speculation in real estate died insolvent. Judge Bucher, who was an associate judge on the bench with Judge Franks, administered on the estate. Mr. Elder brought a considerable number of suits against the administrator. The counsel employed by the administrator simply entered an appearance, without pleading a want of assets. At the usual time, on settling the docket, judgments by default were taken. After some years Mr. Elder issued writs of scire facias to revive the judgments. Judge Bucher became alarmed, and his attorney, Mr. Fisher, asked to have the judgments opened, and the plea of want of assets put in. This was objected to by Mr. Elder, who alleged that the time for such pleading was passed. This gave rise to a lengthened discussion. Mr. Fisher, in arguing his motion, produced many authorities. Mr. Elder, in turn, produced others, and Mr. Fisher rejoined. In the second argument, in addition to commenting on the cases adduced by Mr. Elder, Mr. Fisher cited other authorities. Mr. Elder claimed the right to reply to those additional authorities, and, though Mr. Fisher objected, alleging that he was entitled to conclude the argument, Mr. Elder was heard. In the course of his reply he also adduced new authorities. Mr. Fisher, in turn, claimed the right to reply to them. The court would get wearied with the discussion, and would occasionally adjourn for days or a week or more, and after these see-sawing, turn-about-Jim-Crow operations the judgments were opened and the administrator let into a defense, and this terminated the contest. The case was so long in argument that it was said that during the period of discussion Mr. Elder went to Lykens Valley, and Mr. Fisher built a barn.

"This attempt to compel an administrator to pay out of his estate the debts of an insolvent decedent was rather an ungracious proceeding; and it has since been enacted that 'no mispleading or lack of pleading' shall render any executor or administrator personally liable beyond the amount of assets of the estate received or receivable by him.

"During the presidency of Judge Franks, Tom McElheny was tried for the murder of Sophia German. This case excited very considerable interest at the time. He had been a candidate for the sheriffalty, and desired to be a candidate at the next election. On the morning of the day when she disappeared McElheny had an interview with her at her residence, and it was offered, on the part of the commonwealth, to show that when on the same day, and after McElheny had gone, she was about to leave with her child, of which he was reputed to be the father, she said she was going to meet McElheny, in pursuance of an arrangement with him. This was overruled by the court, and there being no direct evidence against him he was acquitted by the jury. He was not, however, acquitted by public sentiment.

"The manner of discovering the body of Sophia German was very singular. After she had been missing for several days, a man was walking along the hill bordering Swatara Creek. A dog, which he had with him, ran down the hill and barked. The man went down to see the cause of it, and found that the dog was barking at a domestic cat on a tree. On his return to the path he saw a bonnet, which he lifted and hung upon a tree. The bonnet being subsequently shown to the mother of Sophia German, she pronounced it to be that of her daughter. Search was soon made along the side of the hill for the body of Sophia German, and on going along some one laid hold of a bush, which drew out of the ground, and on examination, the body of Sophia German and her child were found in the same grave.

"Calvin Blythe succeeded Judge Franks. He was a native of Adams County, in this State. He had settled at the town of Mifflin, in Mifflin County, where he was elected to the House of Representatives, and was subsequently appointed attorney-general by Governor Shulze, the appointment being made on the 5th of February, 1828. He was also secretary of the commonwealth under the same executive. He was a man of medium size, of respectable appearance; was possessed of excellent understanding, and was of undoubted integrity. He was well versed in legal principles, but not in a knowledge of cases, from the fact of his practice in the law having been interrupted by several official positions. He was indulgent to the bar, rather diffuse in his charges to the jury, and frequently was considered too lenient in the punishment of criminals. But he never avoided responsibility, and acted on the case in hand to the best of his judgment. He was much respected in the community. He received the appointment of collector of customs at Philadelphia, and resigned his judicial office.

"I remember an incident which occurred in the court-house during the presidency of Judge Blythe, which was of an amusing character and which tended to show the deliberateness and unexcitability of the judge.

"A civil case was on trial. Mr. Alexander, of Carlisle, was one of the counsel, and the elder McIntyre, of Perry County, was probably a witness. Suddenly a loud crash was heard, and it seemed as if the upper floor and ceiling of the court-room was giving way. The jury, counsel, witnesses, and spectators rushed to the door. I was among them, and as I went out of the room I turned my head and looked back, but saw no dislocation of the building, but in the excitement I kept on until I reached the pavement. McIntyre continued on across the street, and he was without his hat. I went back to the court-room, and the house was as we left it, but it had been cleared by all except the judge and, as I have since been told, by Mr. Alexander. The judge merely rose and walked back to the window which looked into the yard to see what was the matter. When the occurrence was investigated, it appeared that the front wall of the cellar in the yard of the court-house was lined with boards and plank, and that a cart-load of coal had been dumped down upon it, and this produced the noise which sounded like the crash of the building. The judge and Mr. Alexander, it would seem, were the only persons present who were not frightened. The affair, when understood, afforded much amusement.

"Judge Blythe was succeeded by James M. Porter.

"Judge Porter was a good-looking man, rather above the common size. He was generally considered to be an excellent lawyer, and he was possessed of great industry. He was a brother of Governor Porter, and was appointed by him, it was supposed, to settle some political matters which had happened in the course of his election. He held the office for about a year and a half, when he was succeeded by Anson V. Parsons. Judge Porter was for a while Secretary of War under President Tyler, but was not confirmed by the Senate.

"Judge Parsons was from one of the New England States, and when a young man settled at Williamsport, where he resided when appointed as judge. He was above the medium size, of thin visage, was possessed of staunch energy, in the sessions was a rigid disciplinarian, and in that respect contrasted strongly with Judge Blythe, who was rather mild in his judicial action in the sessions.

"Judge Parsons was transferred to Philadelphia, and Judge Blythe was then reappointed to this district, and remained until he was again appointed to the custom-house at Philadelphia, under the administration of President Tyler. After he was superseded in that position he engaged in the practice of law in Philadelphia, where I became associated with him in the practice. He became paralyzed, and soon after died.

"Judge Blythe was an honest man, was possessed of a kind disposition, but was too generous, liberal, and inconsiderate for his own interest, and though he received a considerable amount of money as collector of the port of Philadelphia, yet he died poor. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and was in the battle of Bridgewater and at the subsequent attack on the fort at Lake Erie.

"He was succeeded as judge by Nathaniel B. Eldred, who was appointed in March, 1843.

"Judge Eldred was a man of medium size, of an angular face, rather unhandsome, but of a genial expression. He was of a social disposition. He came from Wayne County in this State. He was a man of integrity, and was considered by Chief Justice Gibson to be possessed of excellent legal judgment, but he could scarcely be considered a profound lawyer. Whilst occupying his judicial position he was engaged in business matters elsewhere. He was extensively engaged in lumber operations in the West, which induced his absence, and thus interfered materially with his attention to his official duties. He was translated to the Wayne County district, and was succeeded by John J. Pearson, of Mercer County, who was appointed by Governor Johnston in April, 1849. After the termination of the period for which he was commissioned he was elected to the same position in October, 1851, re-elected in 1861, and again in 1871, retiring in 1881.

"These repeated elections, and all without any opposing candidates, were highly creditable to him as evidence of the estimation, for legal qualification and judicial integrity, in which he was held by the people of the district in which he had so long presided. It is also proper to remark that, in addition to the ordinary business of the district, it had been his province to preside on appeals from the decision of the accounting officers of the State, a branch of business not only arduous to him but of great importance to the revenues of the Commonwealth. This had rendered him widely known not only throughout the State, but beyond it.

"Judge Pearson was born in Delaware County, in this State, but in his infancy was taken by his father to Mercer County, where he read law, and was admitted to practice, and was residing in Mercer County when appointed as judge for this district in 1849. He had been elected to Congress for one term, serving there during the administration of Gen. Jackson, and was a member of our State Senate during the administration of Governor Ritner. He has also held courts in other districts, and his ability as a judge is generally acknowledged. He is perhaps better acquainted with the land laws which prevailed in Western Pennsylvania than any other man now living. Titles were held in various counties west of the Allegheny under the laws of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, under the conflict of jurisdiction prevailing as to portions of that region.

"In addition to the preceding judges, Dauphin County for a while had a District Court, in which cases were tried where the value in controversy was of a defined amount, perhaps five hundred dollars. The place was for a while occupied by Judge Bradford, from Sunbury, who was considered as an inefficient judge. He afterwards presided in the York district. Charles Smith, from Lancaster, was also for a while our district judge. He was the compiler of the first five volumes of the laws of Pennsylvania, and the author of a learned note in volume two of that work relative to the land laws of the State. He was a superior lawyer and was prompt and decisive in his action as judge.

"The District Court sprang from the arrears of business on the dockets of the county, and was dispensed with when its existence was no longer required. The Judges of the Supreme Court also for a while held Circuit Courts here and in other parts of the State. An appeal from their decision lay to the court in banc. It was a matter of observation in relation to these courts that the judge who tried the cause in the court below generally adhered to the opinion expressed on the trial. The effect usually was that, so far as his opinion was concerned, the case was not a reverser, but an affirmation of his previous opinion. The same usage exists in the Supreme Court of the United States, the circuit judge before whom the case was tried being present at the final decision of the case. This I consider a usage which should be abrogated. If the supreme judges try cases they should have no vote on the final decision. We have copied, in this respect, the usages in England, where the twelve judges hold courts of Nisi Prius and try causes. We in the arrangement relative to our Supreme Court of the United States walk super outgas via, instead of appointing district circuit judges, whose rulings may be reviewed by a supreme tribunal of which they form no part and where they have no voice to influence the final decision."

The list of attorneys admitted to the Dauphin County bar is herewith given. We have endeavored to make it full and complete, and it is far more so than any list ever published :

"The members who have been admitted to the bar of this county since the organization of the county exceed three hundred.

"On the first day of the holding of the court in May, 1785, on motion of Stephen Chambers, Esq., on his own behalf, he was admitted an attorney of the court; and next, on his motion, were admitted as attorneys, John Wilkes Kittera, John Clark, Joseph Hubley, John Andre Hanna, James Riddle, John Joseph Henry, Peter Huffnagle, and Jacob Hubley.

"On the same day, it is stated, that on motion of Stephen Chambers, James Biddle and Collinson Read were admitted.

"Next, on motion of John Joseph Henry, George Ross was admitted; then, on motion of John Wilkes Kittera, John Reily was admitted. On motion of Stephen Chambers a rule was adopted that the admission of attorneys in this court shall be regulated by the same rules as have been adopted in this respect in the county of Lancaster. This ended the list of attorneys admitted on that day; but subsequently were admitted James Smith, of York; Thomas Ducau, of Carlisle; Jasper Yeates, Charles Smith, and William Montgomery, of Lancaster; William R. Atlee, of Lancaster or Philadelphia; Messrs. Hamilton and David Watts, of Carlisle; Mr. Hartley, of York; and Messrs. Fisher, Elder, Patterson, Laird, and Wallace, of Harrisburg, and afterwards numerous others.

"James Smith was admitted August, 1786. He was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He was also a member of several important State conventions, held a high rank at the bar, and was a man of great wit and good humor. He came from Ireland very young, and died at York 11th July, 1806, at the age of about ninety-three years. The above is from Day's 'Recollections.' In a note to Graydon's 'Memoirs,' it is said that he was educated at the college of Philadelphia, and after he was admitted to the bar there, he removed to the vicinity of Shippensburg, Pa., and there established himself as a lawyer and surveyor. From this he removed to York, in this State, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life. In 1775 he was elected to Congress, and retained his seat in that body until November, 1778, when he resumed his professional business, from which he withdrew in 1800, and died in 1806. In Sanderson's 'Lives of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence' is a more extended notice of him.

"Mr. Alexander Graydon was for a short time in York when a young man. He says that 'there was in that place at that time an oddity; this was Mr. James Smith, the lawyer, then in considerable practice. He was probably between forty and fifty years of age, and was possessed of an original spark of drollery. This, as may perhaps be said of all persons in this way, consisted more in the manner than the matter, for which reason it is scarcely possible to convey a just notion of it to the reader. In him it much depended on an uncatchment of gesture, a certain ludicrous cast of countenance, and a drawing mode of utterance, which, taken in conjunction with his eccentric ideas, produced an effect irresistibly comical, though, on an analysis, it would be difficult to decide whether the man or the saying most constituted the jest. The most trivial incident from his mouth was stamped with his originality; and in relating one evening how he had been disturbed in his office by a cow, he gave inconceivable zest to his narrative by his telling how she thrust her nose into the door and roared like a Numidian lion.'

"Mr. Graydon further remarks that there was then at York a certain judge who resided in Philadelphia. He was a Scotchman; was a man of erudition, and was fond of displaying his historical knowledge; but that Mr. Smith used to set him raving by some monstrous anachronism, as, for instance, 'Don't you remember that terrible, bloody battle which Alexander the Great fought with the Prussians, near the straits of Babemandel?' 'What, sir,' said the judge, repeating with the most inflexible contempt, 'which Alexander the Great fought with the Prussians? Where now did you get your chronology?' Said Smith, 'That you will find is recorded in Thucydides or Herodotus.'

"Mr. Graydon adds that after one of these exhibitions, while every one at the table was holding his sides at the expense of the judge, he, on his part, had no doubt that Smith was the object of laughter, as he was of his disdain. Thus everything was as it should be, all parties were pleased.

"Stephen Chambers was from Lancaster, and, as I understand, was a brother-in-law of John Joseph Henry, who was appointed president judge of this county in December, 1793. John Wilkes Kittera was from Philadelphia, but had settled at Lancaster. John Clark was from York, and had been an officer in the Revolutionary army. He died at York in the present century. He is mentioned in Day's 'Historical Collections.' Joseph Hubley was from Lancaster. John Andre Hanna was a native of New Jersey. He settled in Harrisburg about the time of the organization of the county and laying out of Harrisburg. I saw him once, but do not recollect his personal appearance. From information as to him, he would seem to me to have been an obliging, estimable man. He is noticed favorably, and, as I think, justly, in the narrative of the Duke de Rochefoucault, who visited Harrisburg in the year 1795, and the notice of him has been lately republished here. He says that Gen. Hanna was then 'about thirty-six or thirty-eight years of age, and was brigadier-general of the militia.' He was the brother-in-law of my father, Robert Harris, and was one of the executors of the will of John Harris, the founder of Harrisburg. John Hanna Briggs, lately deceased, one of his grandsons, was named after him. The name of Mr. Hanna is marked on the docket of the court as counsel as late, at least, as the fall of 1795. How much longer I have not specially examined. He was elected to Congress from this district, and served from 1797 till 1805, in which year he died.

"Of James Riddle I know nothing certain. He may have been subsequently of Chambersburg.

"John Joseph Henry, Peter Huffnagle, and Jacob Hubley, were from Lancaster. James Biddle, I suppose John Marks Biddle, was from Reading; and so was Collinson Read, who was the compiler of Read's 'Precedents,' a book formerly much in use.

"Mr. Biddle was a man of very gentlemanly appearance, of courtly manners, and was afterwards, if not at the head, a leading member of the Reading bar. George Ross was from Lancaster. John Reily was from Lebanon County, then a part of Dauphin County, and was the father of Dr. Luther Reily, the well remembered physician of this place.

"Other attorneys, heretofore named, were Thomas Duncan, of Carlisle, afterwards a judge of the Supreme Court. Jasper Yeates, of Lancaster, who was also afterwards a judge of our Supreme Court, and was the compiler of Yeates' 'Reports.' Charles Smith was from Lancaster, and was afterwards the first judge of our District Court. Mr. Atlee and Mr. Montgomery were from Lancaster. Mr. Hamilton, afterwards Judge Hamilton, and Mr. Watts, were from Carlisle; and Mr. Hartley was from York.

"Col. Thomas Hartley was a native of Berks County, born in September, 1748. He studied law in York and commenced practice there. He entered the army at the opening of the Revolution, and soon became distinguished. He commanded a corps in the Wyoming and Susquehanna Valleys after the descent of Butler and the Indians. He was a member of Congress in 1788, and continued to hold the office during twelve years, and held several distinguished offices in this Commonwealth. He died 21st December, 1800, aged fifty-two years. This notice is from Day's 'Historical Collections of Pennsylvania.'

"Mr. Galbraith Patterson resided in Harrisburg. He was a son of Col. William Patterson, perhaps of Lancaster, a gallant officer of the Revolution and in Indian wars preceding. He was well educated and prepared for the study of law, which he pursued in the office of Jasper Yeates, of Lancaster, afterwards, as before stated, a judge of our Supreme Court. How long Mr. Patterson remained in Harrisburg is not known; but perhaps about 1799 or 1800 he removed to the west branch of the Susquehanna near to Williamsport, where he had a considerable tract of land, and he died not long afterwards.

"When Mr. Patterson was in legal practice there were few published reports of decisions of our Supreme Court; and from the commonplace book which Mr. Patterson left, which was prepared with neatness and care, it would appear that he was extensively read. It is said that he was quite a boudonise man and of agreeable address. He was a contemporary of Mr. Fisher and Mr. Elder, of Harrisburg, and John Marks Biddle and Charles Evans, of Reading, who, I have been informed, spoke of him with respect and esteem. He was the father of the wife of Judge Hayes, of Lancaster, and of the late Dr. Edmund B. Patterson, of Lewis-town, who was exceedingly popular as a man, and was distinguished as a physician; and of whose gentility of temper, liberality and friendliness of disposition, it affords me pleasure, from a familiar acquaintance, to speak. Galbraith Patterson contributed to the improvement of Harrisburg by building the brick house on the Market Square, the second house below the Jones House.

"The late William Graydon, of Harrisburg, was one of the early members of our bar. He was the compiler of the book of legal forms, which was formerly in extensive use. He was a man of medium height, of very gentlemanly manners, of dark lively eyes, neat, if not precise in dress, and of an intelligent countenance. He was rather too diffident to encounter the asperities of the bar, and seldom, or perhaps never, was engaged in the trial of causes. He was for many years a justice of the peace. He was an honest Christian man, and was long an elder in the Presbyterian Church. His portrait, painted by Francis, is in existence, and is an excellent representation. He wore a cue, tied with a ribbon, and had his hair powdered. He died in October, 1840, aged nearly eighty-two. He was a brother of Alexander Graydon, who was the first pro-thonatory of this county, he having been appointed to the office, in the year 1785, by the Supreme Executive Council of the State, of which John Dickinson was then the president. Mr. Alexander Graydon was the author of Graydon's 'Memoirs,' which is quite an interesting book. On pages 334-35 of the edition by Littell, is an account of his election. Mr. Alexander Graydon was a gentleman of very respectable appearance, of sprightly agreeable manners, very polite, and, as his book shows, a ready and intelligent writer.

"Our courts were attended occasionally by Mr. James Hopkins, of Lancaster. Mr. Hopkins I have often seen and heard at the bar and in the House of Representatives. He was of medium height, and somewhat robust in form. He was considered to be an excellent lawyer, but was so deliberate in expression and, perhaps, it may be said, insinuate in manner, as to become rather tiresome in his discussions in court. He could, apparently without much exertion, speak for half a day or a day on a point of evidence in order, in endeavoring to enlighten the court, or to consume time till a witness was brought into court, or until some other unprepared-for event was accomplished. He was, in his practice at the bar, the very opposite of Thaddeus Stevens, who finally settled in Lancaster, who never occupied the time of the court when he had nothing to say that was material to the matter in hand, and who seldom occupied more time than was useful to it. I have heard that Mr. Elder considered Mr. Hopkins one of the few lawyers in this part of the State who were especially conversant with the law and practice relative to the Orphans' Court. It never appeared to me, however, that there was special intricacy as to such learning; but Mr. Elder had a great deal of such practice, and put a high estimate upon the knowledge necessary to understanding it.

"Charles Hall, of Sunbury, also occasionally practiced here. He was concerned with Charles Smith, afterwards the judge of our District Court when first established, on the part of the Commonwealth, on the trial of Hauer and others, in 1797 or 1798. He was rather above the common height, stout in person, of ruddy complexion, smooth, handsome face, of gentlemanly appearance and manner, of a highly respectable character, and of considerable ability in his profession. My impression is that he was a ready and agreeable speaker. I think that in the latter part of his life he did not seek practice, and that his family, having an ample estate, he probably retired from professional business. He died about 1824 or 1825, aged, perhaps, above sixty.

"When I was a boy going to school, Mr. Laird, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Elder were the prominent members of the bar residing in Harrisburg. Mr. David Watts and Mr. Thomas Duncan, of Carlisle, the latter afterward on the bench of the Supreme Court, occasionally attended here.

"Mr. Watts was of rough exterior, careless of his dress, and by no means choice in his language. He seemed generally to be not at all reluctant to say what he thought, without regard to the feelings of the object of his remarks. Mr. Duncan, on the contrary, was a man of polished manner, neat and careful in dress, and never rude or wantonly disrespectful to others. They were the rival practitioners at Carlisle. I have heard of an anecdote which somewhat illustrates their respective characters. On one occasion in court, when Mr. Watts was annoyed by a remark of Mr. Duncan, he said, 'You little!' (using some offensive expression), 'I could put you in my pocket.' 'Then,' said Mr. Duncan, 'you would have more law in your pocket than ever you had in your head.'

"I was present at the trial in this place of an indictment in which Mr. Watts was counsel for the defendant. It was an indictment for perjury in qualifying to the return of property by a debtor on his application for the benefit of the insolvent laws. The act of Assembly required the applicant to make return of his property. He submitted a schedule, to which he had been qualified, which he declared was a schedule of his property. It was alleged, on the part of the Commonwealth, that there were fraudulent omissions, and that the deponent had thus sworn falsely. But Mr. Watts made the point that the applicant in swearing that the exhibit was a statement of his property was not to be understood as declaring that it was a schedule of all his property, and therefore that he was not guilty of perjury. The court, Judge Franks being on the bench, instructed the jury to that effect, and the defendant was acquitted. It may be said this instruction was more in accordance with the dictates of humanity than of law. In other words, that it was not common sense, and common law is said to be the perfection of reason or of common sense. There is a caricature of law in an old English play which represented an entertainment of servants in the absence of the master of the house. The conversation turned on law. One of the party said that a position spoken of as law was not law, that it was mere nonsense. 'Oh,' said the other, 'it may be nonsense, but still it may be very good law for all that.'

"Mr. Watts once, at the Carlisle bar, quoted from 'Teague O'Regan,' Judge Hamilton asked, 'What book is that you read from?' 'Modern Chivalry,' your Honor.' It is not a proper book to read from in court,' said the judge. 'I wish,' said Mr. Watts, 'that your honor could write such a book;' and he proceeded with the argument.

"There was a case which was, at the time, the occasion of much merriment at the expense of Mr. Watts. A man and woman were in his office in relation to some legal matter in which their marriage was material. They had been cohabiting together, and Mr. Watts inquired whether they had been married. Not being assured of it, he directed them to stand up. He asked the man whether he took the woman to be his lawful wife. To which he answered in the affirmative. To the question to the woman whether she took the man as her lawful husband, or in words to that effect, she replied, 'To be sure, he is my husband good enough.' The reporter of the case states that Mr. Watts advised them to go before a magistrate and repeat the ceremony, but this was not done. The Supreme Court decided that though marriage is a civil contract, requiring no religious ceremony, yet that it must be entered into in words implying a present agreement to contract it; that in this case the woman referred only to a past cohabitation, and this was insufficient for the purpose. The case is that of Hantz vs. Sealy, and reported in 6th Binney Reports.

"Mr. Watts was an impassioned, forcible, and fluent speaker, and was conceded to be an able lawyer. There was a striking contrast in the appearance of Mr. Watts and Mr. Duncan. Mr. Watts was apparently a strong powerful man, Mr. Duncan was a small man. Their voices were very dissimilar, that of Mr. Watts was strong and rather rough, that of Mr. Duncan was weak, and sometimes quite shrill when excited in pleading.

"Mr. Duncan was appointed a justice of the Supreme Court by Governor Snyder in 1817, in the place of Judge Yeates, deceased. Judge Tilghman, a man of very gentlemanly manners and a model judge, was then the chief justice, and Judge Gibson was the other associate. Judge Duncan eventually removed to Philadelphia, and resided there till his death, in November, 1827. A further notice of him exists in Day's 'Historical Collections,' page 265.

"Since writing the above notice of Mr. Watts and Duncan, I have perceived the following in Brackenridge's 'Recollections of Places and Persons in the West,' the time referred to being in or about 1807. He says that he attended court at Carlisle, where there were two very able lawyers, Messrs. Watts and Duncan. 'The former was possessed of a powerful mind, and was the most vehement speaker I ever heard. He seized his subject with an Herculean grasp, at the same time throwing his Herculean body and limbs into attitudes which would have delighted a painter or sculptor. He was a singular instance of the union of great strength of mind with bodily powers equally wonderful.'

"Mr. Duncan was one of the best lawyers and advocates I have ever seen at any bar, and he was, perhaps, the ablest judge that ever sat on the Supreme Bench of the State. He was a very small man, with a large but well-formed head. There never was a lover more devoted to his mistress than Mr. Duncan was to the study of the law. He perused Coke upon Littleton as a recreation, and read more books of reports than a young lady reads new novels. His education had not been very good, and his general reading was not remarkable; and it was informed that he read frequently the plays of Shakespeare; and from that source derived that uncommon richness and variety of diction by which he was enabled to embellish the most abstruse subjects, although his language was occasionally marked by inaccuracies, even violation of common grammar rules. Mr. Duncan reasoned with admirable clearness and method on all legal subjects, and at the same time displayed great knowledge of human nature in examination of witnesses and in his address to the jury. Mr. Watts selected merely the strong points of his case, and labored them with an earnestness and zeal approaching to fury; and perhaps his forcible manner sometimes produced a more certain effect than that of the subtle and wily advocate opposed to him.'

"Mr. Brackenridge further remarks: 'Among the younger members of the bar, John Bannister Gibson, now chief justice of the State, was the most conspicuous. He, even then, had a high reputation for the clearness and soundness of his judgment and the superiority of his taste.' As to this latter remark I add, that Judge Gibson had a nice musical taste, and was a superior performer on the violin.

"Judge John Bannister Gibson, whose subsequent distinction as a jurist and in other respects has been so eloquently portrayed by Chief Justice Black in his biographical notice, printed in the preface to 7th Harris' Reports, was, in his younger days, rather democratically inclined. In the celebrated case of Eakin vs. Rauh, reported in 12th Serchief & Rawle's Reports, Judge Gibson dissented from the opinion of Chief Justice Tilghman, and in a lengthy opinion contended that though the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania had the power to declare an act of our Legislature to be unconstitutional where it conflicted with the Constitution of the United States, yet it had not such power when it conflicted merely with the Constitution of the State. But Judge Duncan, in an elaborate opinion in the case, demolished such a distinction; and Judge Gibson afterwards acknowledged the correctness of the decision of the majority of the court in the case of Eakin vs. Rauh, in two opinions,—one in the case of Menges vs. Wertmen, reported in 1st Barr, 223, and the other the case of De Chastellux vs. Fairchild, reported in 3d Harris.

"Judge Duncan also delivered an able opinion in another case on an important question in practice. It had been a question whether the decree of the Orphans' Court, on the account of an executor or administrator, was subject to re-examination in a suit in the Common Pleas; and I recollect of a case which had been tried before Judge Gibson, holding a circuit in Lebanon County, in which terms of an account were held liable to be overhauled. But in the case of McPherson vs. Cunliff, reported in 11 Sergeant & Rawle, it was decided that the decree of the Orphans' Court on a question clearly within its jurisdiction was conclusive as to the parties to it, except only on appeal to the Supreme Court. The case had been argued before the Supreme Court by very distinguished counsel, Mr. Parker Campbell, of Washington, Pa., and Mr. Bidle, of Pittsburgh, on the one side, and Mr. Baldwin and Mr. James Ross, of Pittsburgh, on the other. No sketch of the arguments of counsel is given in the report of the case, but the opinion of Judge Duncan is learned and elaborate.

"When I knew Mr. Samuel Laird, which was about the time of the war of 1812-15, he seemed to be declining in business and in health. He was a tall, good-looking man, of a mild, gentle disposition, very gentlemanly and kind in manner, and was considered to be a good lawyer. In the year 1811 he erected the three adjoining three-story brick buildings on Second Street, in one of which I live, and which were then considered to be quite creditable to the place. He died about 1815.

"Two gentlemen read law under the direction of Mr. Laird towards the close of his life,—I mean Mr. John M. Forster and Mr. Jacob B. Weidman. Each of them was a member of the bar for twenty or thirty years, Mr. Forster settling at Harrisburg, and Mr. Weidman at Lebanon, from which county he had come.

"Mr. Forster never had an extensive practice, but was for a number of years the counsel of the Branch Bank of Pennsylvania at this place, of which Mr. Lesley was cashier. He conducted with ability the prosecution of McElheny, who was tried in April, 1827, for the murder of Sophia German. He was not a ready lawyer or speaker, but was possessed of good legal judgment when he had time for preparation. His ability lay in another direction. He had a taste for the military profession, and in that line of life might have been distinguished. He was of medium size and was well formed. He was an excellent penman, an accomplishment in which many of the bar are deficient.

"Mr. Weidman was a lawyer of great industry, and had for many years an extensive and the leading practice in Lebanon County. He was rather above the common size, stout in body, of florid countenance, of genial and jovial manners, and seemed to enjoy excellent health. He was not a fluent speaker, but was pertinacious in the conduct of his causes, and was slow to compromise, having confidence in his management of them. He understood the German language, which was of great advantage to him in Lebanon County, where that was then the common language, half or more of the witnesses in court then testifying in German. He enjoyed the confidence of the people of that county in his judgment and integrity to a great degree. Mr. Forster was his intimate friend, and frequently took part with him in the trial of his causes. I add that even at this time perhaps half of the witnesses at the Lebanon County Court testify in the German language, and that religious societies exist in that county in whose charters the use in their meetings of any other language than the German is expressly forbidden, and schools exist in that county in which the English language is not taught. Judge Pearson has wisely refused to approve of the charter of any religious society with such a prohibition, as being against public policy and the best interests of the people themselves.

"There was another member of the Harrisburg bar who was well known in his day. This was William Wallace.

"Mr. Wallace was a native of this county. I understand that he studied law under the direction of Mr. Kittera, perhaps either in Lancaster or Philadelphia. He was admitted to the bar of this county in June, 1792. He removed to Erie, Pa., where he continued to reside till 1811, when he returned to this place; and when the Harrisburg Bank was established under the bank act of 1814 he was elected its president.

Before the banking act of 1814 was passed there was no bank of issue in this place. That act provided for one at this place and for nearly forty others in different parts of the State. Governor Snyder was then in office, and he vetoed the bill; but the banks provided for in the bill were so numerous that the bill was passed over his veto. Perhaps most of the banks established under it were put into operation, but in many cases, being imprudently managed, and not being required by the business of the community, they produced great injury in their respective neighborhoods.

"The city of Reading had one or more under that bill. Their mode of management was not generally understood by the community; and I have learned that on one occasion a man, unsophisticated in banking matters, came to the bank with his own note and applied for a loan. He was told that he must have an indorser. He innocently asked where the indorsers lived, supposing that there was a class of men designated by law to indorse notes.

"Another man in Berks County, supposing that he could make money out of the operation, gave out that he would indorse notes for ten per cent. of the proceeds; but the result was unfavorable to him, as his liabilities became greater than his receipts.

"Harrisburg was an advantageous location at that time for a bank from its being on the river and under the influence of the lumber trade, which gave it the advantage of a large and extensive circulation; and the Harrisburg bank was a success. It has always maintained a fair reputation, and is considered as one of the soundest of such institutions in the State. The present cashier, Mr. James W. Weir, has for many years been connected with it in that capacity, and enjoys, in a high degree, the respect and confidence of the community.

"From the establishment of the bank until near the time of his death Mr. Wallace was its president, and it may be inferred that his course in relation to it was judicious.

"I was too young, and was then too much absent from home at college, to know him otherwise than by sight. He was one of the examiners of Col. Roberts, when on examination for admission to the bar, and he expressed himself as much gratified at the gentlemanly conduct of Mr. Wallace on that occasion, he interfering when a question of practice was put, a point with which, in his opinion, Mr. Roberts was not reasonably supposed to be acquainted. The acquaintance continued, and Mr. Roberts entertained towards him much respect as a lawyer and a gentleman. He does not seem to have been extensively engaged in the practice of law here, yet the respectability of his character rendered him a credit to the bar of this county. His wife was a daughter of William Maclay, who was a senator with Robert Morris, from Pennsylvania, in the First Congress. Mr. Wallace was the father of the widow of the late Rev. William R. DeWitt, late of this place, and of the Rev. Benjamin J. Wallace, of Philadelphia. He died in this place in May, 1816, in the forty-sixth year of his age. The Rev. Benjamin Wallace was the author of an interesting article relative to the early settlements of this State, containing remarks relative to the killing of the Indians at Conestoga and Lancaster, and an eulogy of the Susquehanna, which has a place in the history of this society.

"It may be remarked that establishing the strength of a republican system of government and its adaptation to a wide expanse of country, and the extending of 'liberty throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof,' were not the only beneficial results of the late parricidal and fiendish war. Another highly beneficial result was realized: the furnishing a currency of general circulation throughout the Union, supported by the government, instead of that existing during a great part of this century, viz., notes entirely, if not utterly, worthless; and others, though sound, yet of such varied description as to plates as to require critical and judicious examination to distinguish the genuine from the spurious; and even as to notes issued in the same State, from the multiplicity of banks and the variety of notes, calling for a degree of knowledge and skill as to the condition of the banks and genuineness of their issue which was difficult of attainment.

"From 1810 till 1830, or some time afterwards, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Elder were in their prime. They were men of very different characteristics.

"Mr. George Fisher was possessed of mild, gentlemanly manners, and was kind in his intercourse with the young members of the bar. He had a ruddy complexion, a fine face, and handsome head. He was a large man; in his youth was probably quite strong, and was quite fleshy toward the end of his professional career. He was remarkable for the musical character of his voice and the distinctness of his utterance. When standing at his office-door on the southwest corner of the market square, where the Presbyterian Church is now erected, he could be heard, with considerable distinctness, fifty yards off. He had also re-markedly strong eyes. I have seen him reading in court, with a candle (we had then no gas) held in one hand and a book or paper in the other, and the candle held so far forward that he seemed to look almost through it.

"He seemed to have been extensively engaged in litigation in ejectment cases depending on original title, which were then a fertile subject of dispute in our courts and in those of the neighboring counties. He occasionally, and perhaps for a number of years, attended the Sanbury court. In my time at the bar he was frequently, so far as respected the facts of his case, not ready for trial, though when he got them fully out he would often manage them well. He seemed to be fond of the study of the law, and had a considerable law library. When Judge Frauks resigned, Calvin Blythe, then, I think, Secretary of the Commonwealth, was spoken of as his successor. Mr. Fisher also desired the appointment, and said that experience at the bar was necessary for that position, and that Calvin Blythe had not had a sufficiency of it. Judge Blythe was, however, appointed. It happened, after a while, that a suit was on trial before him in which Mr. Fisher was the defendant, and it was one of considerable magnitude. Judge Blythe charged in favor of Mr. Fisher. This effected a revolution of opinion concerning the judge in the mind of Mr. Fisher, and he said that he began to think that the fellow would make a pretty good judge. Several years before his death he retired from practice at the bar and resided on his farm below Middletown.

"Mr. Thomas Elder led the bar here in amount of business for perhaps twenty or more years. He was remarkably industrious, being generally in his office late at night. When in court and not engaged in the trial of a case, or with business in the Orphans' Court, of which he had a very large share, he usually was engaged, not in conversation like other members of the bar, but in writing. He was nearly always ready for the trial of his case, and was usually quite familiar with the facts of his case. It was not common for him to ask a continuance of a case when with reasonable vigilance he could have been ready; but Mr. Fisher was frequently in a condition to render a continuance desirable. Mr. Elder was merely a lawyer and man of business. He had little imagination; and his reading, except of law, appeared to have been very limited. He had an extensive acquaintance throughout the county; and when he had important cases on hand looked well to the connection between parties and jurors. He seldom indulged in recreation; his time was pretty much occupied by attention to his profession and to the care of his property, of which he had a large share. He was for many years the president of the Harrisburg Bank, which fact probably contributed to the extension of his business. He had also a large professional business in Lebanon County; but I never knew of his attending court in any other county. He was possessed of strong prejudices, and it is probable that it would have been difficult for him to forgive any one who had offended him in any material matter. He was not without generous impulses. When he took a fancy to a person he would sometimes be social and liberal, not merely in words, but in a pecuniary way; but when he entertained a dislike, he was rather unrelenting. He read law with Gen. Hanna.

"When Mr. Fisher and Mr. Elder were pitted against each other in the trial of a case, it seemed to be as much a personal conflict between them as professional zeal in behalf of their respective clients. Mr. Elder was frequently personally offensive; Mr. Fisher was without malice, but, like a trained boxer, stood up to the fight as long as his opponent carried on the personal contest. Mr. Elder was about six feet in height, and was large in proportion, though not fleshy. His countenance was without color, not pleasant, but his person was remarkably straight and was impressive. In his young days he was exceedingly agile. I have heard that when he was studying law a craftsman from up the river made a banter to jump with any one in the town. Mr. Elder was called on at the office of Gen. Hanna, and was persuaded to engage in the contest. The river man in a running jump leaped nineteen feet, but Mr. Elder leaped four inches farther. He left the bar ten or more years before his death. He left a large real estate. He was a son of Parson Elder, of the Paxton and Derry Churches.

"Mr. Fisher was not so tall as Mr. Elder, but heavier in person. He was the son of George Fisher, the founder of Middletown. Both had superior constitutions and enjoyed excellent health till near the period of their respective deaths. Mr. Fisher died in February, 1853, aged eighty-seven, and Mr. Elder died in April, 1853, aged above eighty-six. They were born within six months of each other, and within six miles of each other, and in the same township in this county. Mr. Fisher was admitted to the bar in November, 1787; Mr. Elder was admitted in August, 1791.

"Mr. Elder was a very successful lawyer. When our district court was established in this county, Mr. Charles Smith being the judge, a considerable number of causes were set down for trial. Mr. Elder put down quite a number, and being one of the oldest practitioners, his cases were at the head of the list. He was concurred in nearly every case tried during the two weeks' court. About twenty verdicts were taken in that time, and Mr. Elder succeeded in obtaining verdicts, if not in all but one of the cases he tried, in all but one, two, or three. Charles Smith was a superior lawyer, and as a judge very ready and decided.

"Neither Mr. Elder or Mr. Fisher contributed to the improvement of Harrisburg by the erection of any substantial building; the houses which they occupied had been built by others.

"Ames Ellmaker was admitted to the bar in this place at the December term, 1808, but removed to Lancaster in 1821. He is mentioned in my article relative to the president judges of Dauphin County. He was possessed of fine conversational powers, and was accessible and pleasant in intercourse.

"From 1810 till 1825 or 1830 there were no other lawyers here, except perhaps Mr. Ellmaker, who had anything near the extent of practice enjoyed by Mr. Fisher and Mr. Elder. There was, however, a member of the bar who was widely celebrated. This was Mr. Moses McClean. He was a native of Adams County, in this State, and was admitted to the bar in 1807.

"Mr. Maclean was possessed of decided literary tastes; but he was not deficient in his argument on legal points when he took the trouble to understand them. His addresses to juries were generally briefly expressed and to the proper points. He was exceedingly indolent, and did not strive to obtain business. He had a fine poetic vein, and some of his productions in that line are highly creditable. His verse on the Scriptural passage (see Luke xxii. 24), 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do,' are exceeding beautiful, and deserve to be extensively circulated. I quote as follows:

"Come, mourning souls, rejoice, be glad,
Drive every fear away;
Come listen to the dying God,
And hear the Saviour pray.

"Legions of angels were his own,
Obedient to His word;
With zeal the immortal warriors burned
To vindicate their Lord.

"Michael, of heaven's own army prince,
Thou didst no succor bring,
Nor grasped by spear, bell's terror once,
To save thy suffering King.

"To earth no thunders dared to roll,
No lightnings flamed abroad,
For meek-eyed love their vengeance chained
Fast to the throne of God.

"Father, forgive them, Jesus cried,
Let vengeance not pursue;
Father, forgive them, was his prayer,
They know not what they do.

"Come, mourning souls, again rejoice,
Cause, every doubt to flee,
Thy Saviour for his murderers prayed,
And he will pray for thee.

"Should persecution's eager shaft
Pursue us while we live,
Jesus, benevolent, divine,
Oh, teach us to forgive."

"Little of his poetry is now remembered, though some may be found in one or more newspapers of the day. I recollect a couple of verses, in a different strain from the preceding, which were written by him as a New Year's Address for a carrier of one of our newspapers. He addressed to these verses persons of various occupations, and those to the innkeepers and storekeepers were substantially to this effect:

"Ye innkeepers, who furnish us brandy and wine,
Nice roast beef and turkey on which we may dine,
When you spread out your table give the traveler his fill,— Let him think of his belly and not of his bill.

"Ye storekeepers, who sell us good coffee and tea,
Don't charge us two dollars for stinking Boha;
When you handle the yardstick, keep your thumb to the spot;
If it slip, slip it forward, or else slip it not."

"He was a Federalist in politics, but during the governorship of Simon Snyder he conceived the idea of being appointed judge. He gave at some celebration a toast, 'Simon Snyder: he distinguishes merit, and rewards it.' Some one asked him when he became a Democrat. 'Why,' he said, 'he helped to carry the lantern.' But this was after the election.

"He was inclined to humor. He once entered a dark room with a gentleman who immediately opened a window. Mr. McClean then observed that a philosophical idea had just occurred to him. 'Well, what was it?' 'Why, when you opened the window, did the light come in or the darkness go out?' The reply was expressive but not complimentary.

"He had a bald head. He said of it that the soil over gold-mines was always barren. He was occasionally called on for toasts at public celebrations, and he was sometimes quite happy in expression. One I recollect was, 'Our Country, a Hercules in its infancy, what will it be in its manhood?' On one occasion a man from Philadelphia was dilating here on the advantages in Philadelphia over those in Harrisburg. 'Why,' says he, 'here you have trouble to get milk; in Philadelphia it is brought to our doors.' 'Oh,' says Mr. McClean, 'that is the reason you have so many calves in Philadelphia.' It is to be regretted that his life had not been more carefully conducted, and that he had not devoted more of his time to study and literary pursuits. He might have left an elevated reputation. He was rather above the common height, inclined to fatness, of large head, not unpleasant countenance, of genial, social manners, and was exceedingly careless in his dress. He went to reside at Huntingdon, in this State, where he died. He married a daughter of John Hamilton, formerly of Harrisburg, and at one time extensively engaged here in mercantile operations.

"Francis R. Shunk, afterwards Governor of the State, was admitted to this bar in September, 1816. He did not enjoy much practice in the profession here, his other avocations—as clerk of the House of Representatives and to the board of canal commissioners, etc.—occupying most of his time. He was a superior penman and an excellent reader. He was a social, kind-hearted man, a very cheerful, pleasant companion, fond of and abounding in anecdote, and not given to evil speaking of others. He was very popular in this place. He removed to Pittsburgh, where he was somewhat engaged in professional avocations, and was residing there when elected as Governor. He was re-elected, but resigned in July, 1848, having discharged with characteristic probity the duties of the executive office.

"Mr. Shunk was very tall, being two or three inches over six feet in height. He was at the head—being the tallest—of the military company to which he marched as a private soldier to Baltimore in 1814. His frame was large, but not fleshy. His appearance was rather ungainly, but his address was so frank and genial that the defects of his form were little considered by those in his company. He was nearly in extremis when he resigned, and he died a few hours afterwards.

"Mr. Abiathar Hopkins was for several years a member of the Harrisburg bar. He was from one of the New England States, and for several years taught a female seminary in Harrisburg. He then studied law and was admitted to the bar, and practiced with credit for several years. After an absence from home for a number of years he went on a visit to his family in New England, and about the time he reached home he took sick and died. He possessed an excellent character, gentlemanly manners, and was much respected here.

"Mr. Samuel Douglas came here from Pittsburgh. He was a member of the Legislature, and it being supposed that there was an opening here for a lawyer of the Democratic side of politics, he removed here. He was appointed attorney-general by Governor Wolf in his first term. He was possessed of ready and animated elocution, and was decided and positive in his expression of opinion and argument. He was considered to be a good criminal lawyer, but was not considered by the profession as distinguished in other departments of the law. He was an Irishman by birth, as was indicated by his speech. He was about six feet in height, thin in person, of plain appearance, and rather awkward in manner. He was a man of fair reputation, and was a member in communion of the Presbyterian Church in this place. He died in this place above twenty years ago.

"Another member of the bar who practiced with considerable success, and with whom I was on specially friendly relations, was William McClure. Though not possessed of the graces of oratory, he had a legal mind of a high order. His judgment on questions of law was excellent. I had great faith in his professional opinion. His memory, too, was remarkable. He kept no docket, but seemed to have but little difficulty to trace up the history of his cases. He was fond of reading, and was possessed of considerable information outside of the law. He was successful in business, and left a considerable estate. He was a native of this county, was a graduate at Cannonsburg, and died in August, 1852. He was at one time one of the representatives of this county in the House of Representatives.

"Judge David Krause was a member of this bar for fifteen or more years. He was a native of Lebanon County, and read law in the office of Judge Walker, who was United States judge, residing in Pittsburgh. Robert J. Walker, afterwards senator and Secretary of the Treasury, was a student in the same office at the same time. Mr. Krause settled for a while at Lebanon, but about the year 1825 came to Harrisburg to act as private secretary to Governor Shulze. He afterwards purchased an interest in the Intelligencer newspaper, printed at Harrisburg, and was connected therein with Gen. Cameron. He subsequently sold his interest in the paper, and was admitted to the bar of this place, commencing practice here about 1828 or 1829. He was a representative from this county in the House of Representatives for one term. In 1845 he was appointed by Governor Porter judge in the Norristown district and removed to Norristown, where he remained till his death. He was a fluent speaker, and possessed of considerable ability both as a writer and speaker. He was of medium height, slight in form, dark hair, of a bright, intelligent countenance, of agreeable manners, and of kind disposition. He died about a year ago, aged about seventy-three.

"Archibald Findlay read law in the office of Mr. Ellmaker, and was admitted to the bar in this county in December, 1820. He subsequently settled at Chambersburg, and died not many years afterwards. He had a fine intellect, and was possessed of refined literary taste. Had he lived he might have become distinguished. He was a son of Governor Findlay and a brother of Judge Findlay, of Philadelphia. He had a remarkably fine person, a highly intellectual countenance, and had bushy red hair. He and I started for college together. We read law in the same office, and were admitted to the bar at the same time.

"Samuel Shoch read law at the same time in the office of Mr. Ellmaker, and was admitted in March, 1820. He is a native of Harrisburg. He was a member of one of the military companies, viz., that of Capt. Crane, which marched from this place to Baltimore in 1814, and which acquired credit without ouch glory in the expedition, as there was no enemy there to combat whilst they were in the service. In one of the other companies, viz., that of Capt. Walker, were Charles and R. Ferdinand Durang, the latter of whom adapted for 'The Star Spangled Banner,' which had just been written, the tune to which it is now sung. The two brothers, after it was sung in camp, sang it on the stage of the Holiday Street Theatre, in Baltimore. (See an account of it in Harper's Magazine of July, 1871.) C. and F. Durang had been members of a theatrical company which had on several occasions visited Harrisburg, and to which belonged the celebrated comedian Blissett and the elder Jefferson, who was quite distinguished as a comic actor. Jefferson subsequently died in Harrisburg, and over his remains a stone was put by the direction of Chief Justice Gibson and Judge Rogers.

"Mr. Shoch was for years the collecting attorney of the Harrisburg Bank. I was concerned with him in the proceeding in the Frey estate at Middletown, as to which application was made in or about May, 1829, to the Supreme Court at Lancaster, under the act of 1818, relative to charitable trusts. George Frey was a native of Germany. He had long been engaged at Middletown in merchandising and milling. He had no children, and he desired to devote his large estate, consisting of above eight hundred acres of land, with a valuable water-power on the Swatara Creek, to charitable purposes. He determined to found an institution not merely for the education, but for the maintenance and education of orphan children, who as a part of their education were to be instructed in the tenets of the Lutheran Church. He did not seek to perpetuate his own name in the title of the institution, but gave it one commemorative of an interesting scene in the life on earth of the Saviour after his crucifixion by calling it 'The Emanuel Orphan House.' His will was dated in 1806, and was written by John Joseph Henry, president judge of the courts of Dauphin County. It was an elaborate one, and contained minute and special directions. It is reported in the case ex-parte Cysell and Spayd, in 3d Watt's Reports. The estate after his death was mismanaged, and the orphan house became decayed and no school was kept. The Lutheran clergyman at Harrisburg, the venerable Mr. Lochman, considering that the children to be maintained and educated in the institution were to be instructed in the doctrines of the Lutheran Church, felt interested in the subject, and applied to Mr. Shoch, whose family belonged to his church, to endeavor to have some action taken on the subject.

"As the will contained a provision for settlement of accounts of the trust in the Courts of Quarter Sessions of Dauphin County, application was made to that court, of which Judge Franks was then president-

Months elapsing after the application without any decision, Mr. Shoch applied to me as an assistant, and it was concluded to make application to the Supreme Court at their session at Lancaster, under the act of 1818, before referred to. In the course of the proceeding a question might be raised as to obtaining a statute in court, inasmuch as no school existed, and consequently no children were in it who were interested in its maintenance. But the will provided for the education of orphans. As an orphan was sometimes defined to be a child who had lost one parent, we concluded to make application in the name of Charles F. Munch, of Harrisburg, as the guardian of certain minor children whose deceased father (the mother, however, surviving the father) had been a member of the Lutheran Church. We did so by petition directed against the former principal, who had resigned, and also against the principal then in charge of the estate, and also against certain of the trustees provided for in the will. This was in May, 1829.

"At the time appointed there appeared against us Mr. Buchanan, a distinguished member of the Lancaster bar and afterwards President of the United States, and Mr. Hopkins, a veteran lawyer of the same bar.

"Mr. Buchanan contended that application having been made to the court of Dauphin County, an election of that forum had been made. Also that the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction of the matter; that the act of 1818 had provided only for cases where no other redress existed, and that in this case the will provided for action in the court of Dauphin County. He ridiculed certain provisions of the will, alleged that no orphan had applied for admission, and that this was the case with regard to the wards of the petitioner.

"After the close of Mr. Buchanan's argument, Mr. Hopkins made some remarks, one of which was that 'if the court will read the will, they will see that it is the will of a foolish man.' To which Judge Huston said, 'We are not going to read the will now, nor is it necessary that we should.' The court sustained the application and directed an account before auditors of their appointment.

"It is proper to remark that on the will being offered for probate in or about the year 1806, the court directed an issue of devisavit vel non, in which the jury found in favor of the will. The character of the will, as well as the sanity of the testator, were of course examinable on the trial of that issue.

"Also it was scarcely competent for the principal, holding office under the will and enjoying advantages under it, to object to its validity. And, further, that if there were provisions in the will of an absurd, unreasonable, or impracticable character, they should scarcely have been permitted to nullify the reasonable, practicable, and meritorious provisions in it.

"In the course of the proceedings before the auditors Mr. Shoch laboriously examined the books of accounts and made abstracts. Being dissatisfied with the auditors' report, we filed exceptions to it, and after argument before the Supreme Court a decree was made which terminated in large charges against the two principals who had charge of the estate.

"Application was then made by us for a change of management, and on the hearing of this proceeding Mr. Stevens appeared and claimed an appointment of the principal on nomination by the Lutheran Synods. In objection to this animated and impressive address was made by Mr. Shoch. Our nominee was appointed, a substantial building has been erected, an act of incorporation has been obtained, and a school established, which is now in operation, and in which the English as well as the German language is taught.

"On the argument in the Supreme Court on the exceptions filed, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Elder were for parties in the case, and Mr. Herman Alricks, then a young man and now a highly respectable member of the Harrisburg bar, appeared for the first principal under the will and contended that he should not be held accountable, alleging that he was under the supervision of and subject to removal by the trustees. The Supreme Court, however, decided differently.

"Mr. Shoch subsequently was for some time the clerk of the House of Representatives of this State; was afterwards secretary of the Constitutional Convention of 1838, and is now the respectable, intelligent, and successful cashier of the National Bank of Columbia.

"There is one provision in the will of George Frey which I do not consider to be authoritative, viz., the provision that no part of the real estate devised shall ever be sold. I conceive that the law-making power has control over all the landed property within the limits of the State, and that where the public interests imperatively require its sale, its sale may be directed, the proceeds, in cases of trust, to be applied to the same uses as declared in the trust. A conversio is not a diversion. It must sometimes, if not frequently, be a great public inconvenience or a positive evil that real estate remain in the same condition and subject to the same uses as those for which it has been devised or conveyed. It is not reasonable that one or more persons, whose life cannot in the course of nature long endure, shall impress upon property of which he or they happened to be possessed a character, either as to sale or partition, which shall bind the public in all time and under all circumstances and conditions. The earth is for the living and not for the dead, and though wills of decedents and agreements of individuals are entitled to and should receive reasonable respect, yet to such considerations the public interests are paramount. See Norris vs. Clymer, 2 Barr, 277.

"In conclusion as to the will of George Frey:

"The application to the Supreme Court on the part of members of the Lutheran Church not being successful, an act of Assembly was obtained in 1846 for the appointment of the trustees on the nomination of the two Lutheran Synods lying east and west of the Susquehanna. The case arising under the act was taken to the Supreme Court, who in the case of Brown vs. Hummel, reported in 17th Barr, decided that the act was unconstitutional, and that the trustees in office could not be removed without a hearing at law. Now, it was sought by the act of 1846 to obtain a change of trustees in the interests of the Lutheran Church and not on account of misconduct on their part, and therefore a trial at law would not have effected the object, but the act of 1846 may have been objectionable as limiting the choice of trustees to those of a particular church, whereas the will of the founder provided that 'members in good standing of any of the Protestant Churches' should be eligible.

"The judge who delivered the opinion of the court in the case of Brown vs. Hummel declared that the charter or act of incorporation of the institution was a contract between the government and individuals, and the case of the Dartmouth College vs. Woodward, reported in 4th Wheaton, was referred to in support of the position. Now it may be somewhat difficult to see how the act of incorporation of a public charity is a contract, and not merely an act of ordinary legislation liable to alteration by the Legislature which enacted it or by a subsequent one, especially where no money is paid to the Commonwealth or required by the act to be expended, which might not, under the terms of the will, be expended without the act. But such it has been declared to be in the case of Brown vs. Hummel, before referred to.

"It may not be improper to add that if the obligations of a contract rest upon the Commonwealth as to every act of incorporation of a charitable, literary, or banking institution, horse or other railroad, or act of incorporation for any other purpose, and if any evil provision cannot be repaired except something be done beyond the terms of the act of incorporation, and even then not directly by the enacting power, acting by its own force or by such instrumentality as it may choose (but always according to the requirements of justice), but necessarily through a proceeding in court, then the law-making power ought to be especially careful as to the privileges granted or contained in them. The legislative will may otherwise turn out provisions which may be unpalatable to the public taste or injurious to the health of the body politic.

"The Constitution of the United States was not framed till 1787. It contains the brief provision that no State shall pass any law 'impairing the obligation of contracts.' It does not explain whether the contracts meant are simply contracts between individuals, or also contracts between individuals and the government. The Dartmouth College case did not refer to a charter granted in this country and since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, but to one granted to the trustees of Dartmouth College in 1769 by the British crown, and it was this literary institution, thus formed, that the Supreme Court of the United States applied the inhibition to the States to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and this outique case was referred to in support of the decision in Brown vs. Hummel.

"Is it not true that the Dartmouth College case and other kindred decisions, no matter by what authority supported,—and they are supported by the authority of great names,—be reported, but not limiting the negation to charters of literary or charitable institutions, but giving it a wider scope, and the power of the Legislature to control them be acknowledged?

"It has been argued and alleged that where Congress, or, by parity of reasoning, a State Legislature acts within its constitutional power in repealing or changing the terms of an act of incorporation, the justice which should certainly attend such proceeding should legally be measured by a proceeding at law. But if Congress or the Legislature of a State possess the power of repeal or alteration, why should not the proper measure of justice be administered in such manner or by such instrumentality as the legislative power shall direct? And is it not worthy of consideration whether the prohibition to the States as to interfering with contracts refers simply to contracts between individuals, and not to contracts between individuals and the government itself? It is a legal principle, in the construction of statutes, that the sovereign is not included unless expressly named. See Broom's Legal Maxims, 73. Why should not this principle be applied to the provision as to contracts in the Constitution of the United States?

"The Supreme Court of the United States also decided, in the case of The State of New Jersey vs. Wilson (see 1 Kent's Com. 414-15) that the power of taxation could be permanently surrendered. Now 'the taxing power is an incident of sovereignty, an essential part of every independent government.' (Black, C. J., in the case of The Bank of Pennsylvania vs. The Commonwealth, 7th Harris, 152.) How, then, can it be surrendered by a temporary legislature? 'Taxation to be just must be equal, and to be equal must be universal.' 'To exempt some would be to increase the burdens of others.' (Idem.) Why, then, should the property of institutions, not for burial or religious objects or for purposes of general charity, be relieved of a burden to which that of the poor is subjected?

"The occasion to which I have referred was not the only one on which I have heard Mr. Buchanan. I heard him frequently in our State Legislature when he was a young man, and I then much admired him. His voice was agreeable, very clear, with a ringing sound, and loud; his enunciation was exceedingly distinct; he was fluent in speech, though deliberate, but not unpleasantly so; his manner usually animated, and his language unexceptionable. I also heard him in the Senate at Washington, just previous to the inauguration of Gen. Harrison. He spoke in opposition to an impracticable, absurd resolution, introduced by Mr. Crittenden, soon to be one of the new cabinet, prohibiting officers of the general government from interfering in elections. An earnest discussion took place, the Senate being addressed by Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Clay, Mr. Mangum, Mr. Wright, Robert J. Walker, and perhaps by Mr. Calhoun, and in my estimation Mr. Buchanan was not surpassed by any one on that occasion. He was an agreeable speaker, and very able and impressive in debate; but he was considered to be timid and irresolute when required to assume responsibilities on occasions of extraordinary importance to himself or to the public interests. When secession was threatened or actually begun, had he possessed the resolution and intrepidity which, at such a crisis, should have been displayed by the head of the government, the South would not have been in doubt whether secession would be met by mere protestation, acquiescence or entreaty, or fought to the bitter end. But Mr. Buchanan appears to have been fitted for action in quiet times, rather than the stormy scenes of politics or revolution.

"Mr. Buchanan was tall in person, his form large and well developed. His head, however, from some diseased condition, or from malformation in his neck, hung to one side. He dressed carefully, and his appearance was gentlemanly and impressive.

"Two young men read law in the office of Mr. Shunk when he was in practice here, viz., William M. Hall and James Findlay, and they were admitted to the bar in November, 1822.

"Mr. Hall was a native of Harrisburg. His mother was a daughter of William Maclay, and she resided at the time of her death in the stone house on the corner of Front and South Streets, in this place, which had been built about the year 1794 by her father, and which was the second stone house built within the present limits of Harrisburg, the one erected in 1766, near the lower end of Front Street, by the second John Harris, subsequently the founder of Harrisburg, being the first.

"Mr. Hall settled at Lewistown, in the county of Mifflin, where he soon got into practice; and had he continued at the bar, from his marked ability and great industry, would probably have attained a high rank in the profession. But his mind becoming religiously impressed, he abandoned the practice of law, studied divinity, and became a clergyman in the Presbyterian Church, and was widely known throughout the State. His health became impaired, and he died in middle age at Bedford, in August, 1851. His mind was too active and energetic for the frail tenement in which it was lodged. His bodily strength was not sufficient for attaining a knowledge of two professions. His eyes were prominent and he was near-sighted, but he did not discover the imperfection till he was well grown, when, hearing some boys speak of seeing something on the island opposite, he at first disbelieved that the island could be seen distinctly from the town, and it was then he discovered his defect of vision. Mr. Hall was a very honest, upright man, reliable in his friendships, and a sincere Christian. One of his sons is now a member of this bar.

"James Findlay was a son of Governor Findlay, four of whose five sons were admitted to the bar. He settled in Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., where he had been appointed the prosecuting officer, and from which county he was afterwards elected to the Legislature, where he soon became distinguished. He was subsequently appointed Secretary of the Commonwealth by Governor Wolf. He eventually removed to Pittsburgh, where he was joined in the profession by Mr. Shunk a short time before his nomination for the office of Governor. He there died, unmarried, in middle age, about the year 1844. James Findlay and his elder brother, Archibald, herebefore mentioned, were men of gentlemanly instincts and manners, and were each of rather superior ability and of fair reputation.

"I here take occasion to mention that Governor William Findlay, for whose memory I entertain a youthful respect, has been confounded with William Findlay, of Westmoreland County. See Graydon's 'Memoirs,' edited by Littell, pages 356 and 373.

"Mr. McCormick was known to most of the present members of the bar. He was a superior lawyer, and from his unexcitable temperament might have been well fitted for the bench. When actively engaged in his profession he had a more extensive practice than any other of those who came into practice with him. His opinions on matters of law were generally reliable, and he was extensively called on for counsel after, from loss of sight, he ceased to be able to try cases in court. He was an effective speaker, and when he lost a cause it might generally be considered that he had the wrong side of it. He was of medium size, and of intellectual countenance. It would seem that after arriving at manhood he never enjoyed good health. He was sedentary in his habits, taking but little exercise either in walking or otherwise. He was rather unsocial in intercourse, but seemed to enjoy the company of his friends when in his office. His eyesight, perhaps owing to his sedentary life, and perhaps excessive and incautious uses of his eyes, became impaired, and he became blind. The affection, however, did not seem to affect his spirits, and in his office he seemed much as usual. Though sorely afflicted for many years, he bore his affliction, at least publicly, with little murmur or complaint. He died in January, 1870, aged sixty-nine.

"John C. Kunkel was of quite prepossessing appearance. He was of medium height, slight, but well formed, had a ruddy countenance and very clear complexion. He had a pleasant voice, was a highly agreeable speaker, and more accomplished in that respect than any other member of the bar of this place since the organization of the county. Though distinguished as a speaker, he was not considered by the leading members of the bar here to be so as a lawyer. To attain eminence in knowledge of law requires close and attentive study, as well as large practice, and he had not industry or resolution sufficient to effect that result. He was twice elected to Congress, but his business engagements at home interfered so much with his representative duties that he was not distinguished as a member of Congress. He was unusually successful in the acquisition of fortune, a portion of which he left to purposes of charity. He died in October, 1870.

"There was another member of the bar who died some years ago who was considerably distinguished for his knowledge of law and for industry in his profession. This was John A. Fisher. He came to the bar in December, 1820, when his father, Mr. George Fisher, heretofore spoken of, was still in considerable practice, and thus was enabled the more readily to get into business. He was the most laborious lawyer I have known in the course of my practice here. He was generally ready for the trial of his causes when by reasonable diligence it could be effected. His usage in the trial of a cause was to endeavor to write down nearly all of the oral testimony delivered, not trusting to his memory for it. This contributed to lengthen trials in which he was engaged, and was often complained of by the court and the adverse counsel, but he was pertinacious. When his turn came he gave the cause a thorough examination. In the preparation of his paper-books for the Supreme Court he was elaborate, and it was not his fault if his side of the case was not understood. He pursued the profession for about forty years, and had an extensive and lucrative practice in this and Lebanon County. He was generally concerned in the few ejection cases which depended on original title which were tried here after the older lawyers, who had large experience in that line, had died or had retired from the bar. These cases related to timber lands or mountain lands in the coal region, which had become an object of special attention. He also drafted the act of March, 1860, for the incorporation of the city of Harrisburg, which extensive act is evidence of his ability and is a specimen of his industry. He died in July, 1864, aged sixty-six. He was a large man, of remarkably vigorous constitution, and of great strength and power of endurance.

"Charles C. Rawn was a member of this bar for fifteen or twenty years. He was from one of the eastern counties of this State, perhaps from Chester. He was possessed of considerable ability, of great energy of character, and was indefatigable in attention to his professional business. He was fluent in speech, and in controversy was the last to yield. He was a relative of Governor Shunk, which connection most probably induced his settlement here. He had been of the Democratic school of politics, and was decidedly opposed to abolition, alleging a fear of a servile war of blacks against whites, but when the war began he was decided for the Union, and became a provost-marshal in the mustering in of troops. He was successful in his profession. He was a very industrious man, and I understand that for years he kept a journal which, if it covered the whole period of the late war, may contain some interesting reminiscences. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church in this place. He died in December, 1865, aged sixty-four. He was about six feet high and of good address.

"Another member of our bar was well known in his day, and is deserving of notice on account of the spirit he displayed in regard to enterprises of a public character without an absorbing interest in them as to personal advantage on his part. I mean William Ayrea. His knowledge of law as well as his general reading was quite moderate, but his judgment on common matters of a practical character was excellent. He had great energy of character and a large degree of public spirit. He had also considerable ingenuity and management in originating and forwarding public enterprises. He arranged the construction of the Harrisburg water-works, forwarded that of the Broad Top Railroad, and had the survey made of a railroad from Harrisburg to Hamburg, which is now in process of construction. He was a member of the House of Representatives for two terms. He was a man of large size, rather fleshy, of genial temper, of excellent disposition, obliging, and social. His life was a useful one. He seemed to have enjoyed excellent health till near the period of his death. He died in May, 1856, aged sixty-four.

"In December, 1867, occurred the death of Judge McKinney, aged seventy-one. He studied law in Carlisle under the direction of Judge Duncan, and was exceedingly well grounded in its elementary principles. He had not the faculty of fluent expression, and did not succeed well in practice. He was at one time one of the associate judges in this county. He was the author of several legal works, one on the Constitution of the United States, a work on the office of justice of the peace, and a digest of the laws of Pennsylvania. He was an upright, conscientious man, was a decided abolitionist, being one of the vice-presidents of the Anti-Slavery Society as long ago as 1836, was long a member of the Presbyterian Church of this city, of which he was an elder, and was a zealous Christian. His death occurred through accident on the street railroad in this city.

"William H. Miller was a member of this bar for ten or more years. He was possessed of a fine physique, was nearly six feet high, and well formed. He was gentle and agreeable in manner, of a social turn, and of a kind disposition. But in politics he was inflexible. His father had been one of the Democratic leaders in Pennsylvania, and his son imbibed early the same political faith. He seemed to think that the interests of the country were bound up in the ascendancy of Democratic men and the principles and measures which they advocated, and that the course of the Republican party was the direct reverse. He seemed to have a strong predilection for politics, and was usually ready to support his party or encounter the political enemy. He represented this congressional district at the beginning of the late war. He was one of the counsel of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. I should think that he had not devoted much of his time to the study of his profession. His practice, perhaps, was chiefly in the criminal courts. He was a ready, forcible, and agreeable speaker. He died in September, 1870, aged forty-two.

"John H. Briggs was born in Cumberland County, but resided here for the last thirty years. He was a respectable lawyer, though he never had much practice in the trial of causes. He had considerable experience as an accountant and auditor, and was appointed by the court, or on nomination of parties, to adjust important interests in that matter. He was an upright, honorable man, and his death was much regretted in this community. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church in this place, and had long been connected with it. He was above the ordinary height, was well formed, and of very gentlemanly appearance. He died in March, 1872, aged fifty-seven.

"There was lately an ancient member of our bar lingering on the threshold of life. I mean John Roberts. Col. Roberts was connected with the bar for more than half a century. He never had an extensive practice. His tastes were of a mathematical and scientific character. As a civil engineer, surveyor, and draughtsman he was quite accomplished. He was fond of reading, and was possessed of a fund of information in science, history, and general literature. He was a botanist of respectable character, with some knowledge of mineralogy and geology. He had a fine musical taste, and was quite an excellent performer on the violin. He was possessed of more varied attainments than any other member of our bar. He was once a member of the House of Representatatives. He was also an exceedingly good peerman, and was for years probatory of our county, and was a model officer.

"The colonel was not only proficient on the violin, but he was an excellent dancer; and dancing then was out, as at present, the simple walking through a figure, nor the vulgar waltzing of the present day, but a display of agility and grace in the contradance, reel, or cotillon. The colonel could cut pigeon-wing with the ease of a theatrical professor; and this was an accomplishment possessed by few of his young companions. He was the orderly sergeant of Capt. Walker's company, which marched to Baltimore in 1814. He was possessed of an amiable, inoffensive disposition, and his life has been highly useful to the community. This last is eulogy. As respects his memory, he might have said, in the words of Bishop Bonar,—

"I need not be missed if my life has been bearing,
As its summer and autumn moved silently on,
The bloom and the fruit and the seed of its season,
I shall be remembered by what I have done."

"He was of medium size, rather slight in body, of a dark complexion, bright dark eyes, and of intelligent countenance. In his youth he was probably very active. Although his bodily strength had failed in his latter years, his mind remained clear till near the closing scene of his life. He was the oldest member of this bar living at the time of his death. He was no honest man. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church. His faith was firm, and he was not unwilling to meet death when the summons should come. He died in February last, at the advanced age of eighty-five.

"Of such of the bar as are still in practice I forbear to speak; and besides, their respective qualifications and characters are as well, and, as to many of them, better known to those who are in practice with them. I end with the suggestion that if members of the bar in other cities or counties in the State would prepare and publish biographical notices of distinguished members of the bar in their respective cities or counties or judicial districts, with notice of matters of a public character with which they have been connected, information of public interest may be preserved which may otherwise be lost. Leading members of the bar are often more or less connected with events interesting to the public occurring in their own neighborhood."

PAXTANG TOWNSHIP.

AMONG the records of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lancaster County are the following entries:

"Boundaries of the townships in Lancaster County, as they were settled and agreed upon by the magistrates and inhabitants of the said county the 9th day of June, and confirmed by the Court of Quarter Sessions the first Tuesday in August ensuing, Anno Domini, 1729."

Then follow the names and boundaries of a number of townships, covering the territory of the county from the Octorara to the Kittochitnny Mountain, among these being the names of Peshtank (Paxtang) and Derry, which comprised the whole of Dauphin County south of the first range of the Kittochitnny Mountains and a part of now Lebanon County, that of Paxtang being described as follows:

"The township of Peshtank, beginning at the mouth of Sutaaro, thence up the river to Kehtohnting hill above Peter Allens, thence eastward by the south side of said hill to the meridian of Quetopobello mouth, thence on a south course to the mouth of the same at Sutaaro, and down Sutaaro to the beginning."

In 1736-37 the first division of the township occurred, the erection of Hanover township from the northeastern portion, and thus the division continued until only a small portion of the original township is thus designated, and that is the township of Lower Paxtang, Peshtank, or Paxtang, as we prefer to spell it, and which orthography we have uniformly adhered to, notwithstanding the errors of the past eighty years, which have given us the English Paxton for the Indian word Paxtang. It was so named for the inconsiderable stream which was then within its borders.

The warrantees given in the chapter on the early settlements give us the names of the pioneers of this section, and much of the history of the township proper is interwoven with that of the county. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with merely giving a few facts not previously recorded, and which come in in our narrative more appropriately here.

The tax-lists of this section prior to 1750 are not in existence, unless it is that for the "North End of Paxtang," which is herewith given:

As the assessment-lists for the entire county of Lancaster are the fullest for 1780, we give that return for Paxtang. As yet Harrisburg is not distinct or separate as that of Middletown. It was not then as important a place. By it we find the following items of general information :

Mills were owned by George Deirbach, John Fritz, John Garber, Philip Griner, John Gilchrist, John Jamison (2), Jacob G. Miller, Widow Nobb.

Stills were in the possession of Andrew Berryhill, Henry Boal, Joseph Flora, Joseph Flora, Jr., John Garber (2), Matthias Hoover (3), John Jamison, James Mahan, Robert Neal, John Noop (2), Jeremiah Sturgeon, John Wonderly (2).

Ferries were owned by Maxwell, Robert, and Rowland Chambers. and by William Gibbons. John Harris, it would seem, was not taxed for his; having purchased outright the privilege, was not subject to taxation. It was called a "Public Ferry."

A Tan-yard was owned by David Patton, the only one taxed in the township, while at Middletown Daniel Dowdle, Frederick Hubley, John Snider, and Abram Tar carried on these establishments.

As previously stated, the first division of Paxtang was when Hanover township was erected; then, in 1791, when the borough of Harrisburg was incorporated; followed by Swatara in 1799; and Susquehanna in 1815, leaving only that portion of the township now known as Lower Paxtang, although never erected as such. To distinguish it from the northern portion of the county, which was set off as Upper Paxtang in 1767, it was thus termed by general usage merely.

CITY OF HARRISBURG.

The Proprietary Grants—Manor of Paxtang—The Ferry Grant—The Harris Mansion—Proposals to lay out a Town—Conveyances to the Public by John Harris—Early Reminiscences of the Town—Louisburgh—"Pumpkin Flood"—Taxables for 1787.

OF Harris' Ferry, the site of the flourishing and prosperous city of Harrisburg, and of the individual who gave it name, we have alluded in the general history of the county.

On the 17th of December, 1733, the Proprietaries of Pennsylvania granted to John Harris, by patent, three hundred acres and allowance of land, extending from what is now Herr Street, formerly the upper boundary of the old borough of Harrisburg, down the river to a black-oak somewhere near the termination of Walnut Street with Front Street, and thence back by a line continuous with Mulberry and Tenth Street east of the canal to the rear line, now the line of Sixteenth. On the same day, Dec. 19, 1733, a patent was granted to Joseph Turner for five hundred acres and allowance, adjoining the above and extending down the river from the aforesaid black-oak to what is now the division line between the lands of the late John Mahan and Mrs. Hanna, deceased, extending back from the river, and embracing the James Harris tract, now the property of A. B. Hamilton. This was taken up by John Harris in the name of Joseph Turner, no doubt, to comply with certain usages of the land-office, for on the next day (December 18th) Joseph Turner conveyed to Edward Shippen, who on the next day (December 19th) conveyed to John Harris.

North of now Herr Street was the manor of Paxtang. It was one of the Proprietary reservations of land, and one of the smallest manors in the Province, but its soil was unequalled. It is described as bounded on the northwest corner by land of John Harris, the elder; that in 1732 was at a beech-tree, on the top of the bank of the Susquehanna River, near where the present Front and Herr Streets intersect. It included about twelve hundred acres; the river line six hundred eighty-nine perches and three hundred yards, being over two miles. The land is thus described in a survey made by Isaac Taylor, June 4, 1733, "for Thomas Penn, Esquire;" "Commencing at a water-beech; thence east-northeast two hundred and fifty-two perches to Paxtang Creek; thence north one hundred and twenty perches; thence north by east two hundred and eighty perches to a black-oak; thence northwest one hundred perches; thence west by north three hundred and eighty perches to a black-oak on the bank of the Susquehanna River; thence down said river six hundred and eighty perches."

Taylor notes that when he passed the Harris line (east of the canal), west of Paxtang Creek was all vacant land on the remaining sides of the manor. These bounds would seem to include from the river to the present "Miller's school-house," on the high ridge above the hospital, the grounds of which are within the survey. Its north line was the south one of the "John Reel farm." This comprises some of the most fertile land of the river valley. The Penns, however, were too poor to preserve it intact, and began to sell portions of it about the time of Braddock's defeat, disposing of the last of it about ten years before the Revolutionary war. In conveying this land we find no mention of quit-rent, the instrument being for the fee; an important distinction between this and the manors of Conestoga, Springett, Maske, and Lowther.

Taylor's survey was sent to the land-office at Philadelphia, and very carefully criticised there, being deemed of such importance as to induce Thomas Penn to visit Harris' Ferry in 1736. While here he obtained personal knowledge of its value. We hear of it next in an application of James Galbraith, of Lancaster County, for two hundred acres, including a piece of this manor. The warrant was granted Jan. 9, 1749. When the survey was returned the following was indorsed upon it—Mr. Scull being surveyor-general:

"MR. SCULL.—One James Mitchelltree improved this land before the prop^r, Thomas Penn, came into the country, by express permission of Mr. Logan, and a part of his improvement was run into the manor of Paxtang, but with no intent to deprive him of a grant of land on the common terms, &c., &c., whenever a patent is applied for; the purchase money is to be at £15.10 per 100, and $\frac{3}{4}$ d quit rent per acre, ent. & award from 1st March, 1732.

"R. PETERS."

This shows that the next tract above Harris, on the Susquehanna, was "improved" before 1732. The family of Mitcheltree had land in what is now Susquehanna township. Galbraith's tract proved to contain two hundred and forty-five acres with allowance, and was that part of the manor east of "Paxting Creek," "the south line commencing just south of Dead Horse Brook; thence northeast one hundred perches to lands of James Alcorn; thence north and west by sundry corners to lands of Thomas Armstrong; thence west and northwest one hundred and fifty-eight perches along lands of Arthur Forster; thence west one hundred perches to the creek; thence down Paxting Creek two hundred and sixty-six perches." The date of the survey Sept. 5, 1750. The part owned by Galbraith within the manor was found by subsequent survey to be one hundred and twenty-five acres.

The next survey was that of Bertram Galbraith, May 12, 1759, when "Mister Penn's eleven hundred and forty acres without allowance" is thus described. It excludes James Galbraith's one hundred and twenty-five acres: Commencing on the north line of "John Harris' land, at a birch-tree on the bank of the Susquehanna;" thence north sixty-five east two hundred and fifty-two perches to Paxtang Creek at an "elm;" thence north and north by east two hundred and twenty perches; ninety-four perches northwest; thence north eighty west three hundred and thirty-eight perches to a Spanish-oak on the bank of the Susquehanna; "thence down said river six hundred and eighty-nine perches," making the western front nine perches in excess of the survey of 1733. The adjoining lands are James Alcorn, northeast of Harris; James Galbraith, Archibald Forster, James Potts, Widow (Thomas) Armstrong; on the river, James Chambers.

In 1760, Thomas Simpson was owner of four hundred acres of the south part of this manor. His will is dated Dec. 24, 1760, and devises to his two sons, Thomas and Michael, three hundred and eighty-six acres, share and share alike. In 1778, Adam Eckart, who at one time was owner of a large body of land in and about Harrisburg, purchased two hundred and two acres of the Simpsons, and subsequently nearly all of that land.

The next above Simpson was Thomas Forster, "Esquire," who held four hundred acres. North of him was Thomas McKee, who held "about four hundred acres." The transactions in this land took place after the survey of 1759.

In 1786, Adam Eckart, joiner, and Catharine his wife, conveyed to Joshua Cooper, tanner, and they to Abraham Huy, six lots of ground comprising the town of "New Philadelphia." This town-plot was three acres; a narrow strip along the river from Herr Street to south side of Reily. It was known for many years as Pottstown, "Hard Scrabble," and other fancy names—now that row of buildings on the west side of Front Street which so much disfigures the locality of that fine thoroughfare.

The adjoining owners on the survey of 1759 appear in the boundaries of this portion of the manor, with the additional names of "Reverend John Hersh, Thomas and William Gaullaugher," whose lands were along Paxtang.

1789, Capt. John Hamilton purchased all of the Galbraith tract within the manor,—one hundred and twenty-five acres,—together with one hundred and fifty-five acres of the manor running out to the river. About the same time other parties made purchases, the whole amounting to nearly eight hundred acres; so that it had all passed out of the ownership of Penn before Harrisburg was five years old.

The next considerable transaction was in 1810, when Abraham Huy (corrupted into Huey, always, however, written by its owner Huy) conveyed one hundred and fifty acres to Christian Kunkel. This was sold by George Kunkel and David Hummel to Luther Reily, John Whitehill, and Adam Henry Orth. Then a number of owners of parts of the manor began to appear, and as we write more than five hundred persons own parts of "Mister Penn's manor of Paxtang."

The conveyance of any part of this land to "the low-water mark of the Susquehanna" is without right. Penn claimed only to the bank of the Susquehanna. The low-water mark bound of modern deeds is an assertion of a right which did not originally pertain to the land within this manor.

The land in the lower portion of the city, including the First and Second Wards, and portions of the Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Wards, were of different surveys and not in John Harris' warrants.

John Harris' first habitation was on the lower bank of the river, about one hundred and fifty or two hundred feet below the spot where now repose his remains. The foundation walls of this house have been seen by some of our oldest citizens. A well, dug by Mr. Harris, still exists about one hundred feet east of his grave. It was covered over about thirty years ago, but its site is easily distinguished by a small circular mound of earth. In connection with his mansion-house he erected a large range of sheds, which were sometimes literally filled with skins and furs, obtained by him in traffic with the Indians, or stored there by Indian traders, who brought them from the western country. These skins were carried, at an early day, on pack-horses to Philadelphia for sale. A representation of this log house, the original of which is in possession of Gen. Simon Cameron, is herewith given.

The second John Harris inherited that portion of his father's estate upon which the borough of Harrisburg was subsequently laid out. For three-fourths of a century the site was known as Harris' Ferry. The ferry right was not granted until the year 1753, as by the following copy of the original document:

"Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, Esqrs, true and absolute proprietaries and Governors-in-chief of the Province of Pennsylvania and counties of New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, upon Delaware. To all unto whom these presents shall come, greeting: WHEREAS, It hath been represented to us that the frequent passing and repassing of people over our river Susquehanna hath made it necessary that ferries should be erected and established at proper places for the ready carrying over our said river all travelers and other persons whose business and affairs may call them into these parts of our said province. And it being made known to us that the plantation and tract of land belonging to John Harris, of the county of Lancaster, yeoman, lying on the east side of the said river Susquehanna, in the township of Paxtang and county aforesaid, by means of the convenient situation thereof, is a proper place for erecting and keeping a ferry for that part of our said provin-

and cattle, all such reasonable toll-fees or reward as hath heretofore been accustomed, or shall be hereafter settled for the same (us, our heirs and successors, and our Lieutenant-Governor, attendants, and servants only excepted), to have and hold the said ferry privileges and profits hereby granted unto the said John Harris, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the 1st day of March next unto the full end and term of seven years from thence next ensuing, and fully to be complete and ceded, yielding and paying for the same yearly unto us, our heirs and successors, at the town of Lancaster, in the said county, at or upon the 1st day of March, in every year during the said term, ten English silver shillings, or the value thereof in coin current, according as the exchange shall then be between our said province and the city of London, to such person or persons as shall from time to time be appointed to receive the same. Provided always, and these presents are upon this condition and limitation, that the said John Harris, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall from time to time, and at all times hereafter, during the said term, continue to keep, or cause to be kept, a boat or boats, scow or scows, to good sufficient repair, with good and sufficient persons or hands to give and the said John Harris having requested our license for erecting and maintaining a ferry over the said river at the place aforesaid, and that we would be pleased to grant him the same for a certain term of years therein expressed. Now Know Ye, that in consideration of the charge and expense that must arise on providing of necessary flats and boats, and constant attendance requisite thereunto, we have given, granted, and confirmed, and by these presents, for us and our heirs, do give, grant, and confirm unto the said John Harris, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the sole privilege of keeping and occupying the said ferry over the said river at the place aforesaid, where a ferry has always been kept for the carrying over of all persons, wagons, carts, horses, and cattle traveling or passing that way, hereby strictly forbidding and prohibiting all other persons, on either side of the river, from carrying over the same, within the distance of one mile and a quarter above and below the ferry hereby settled and established, for hire, pay, or reward, in any flat, boat, or canoe, any persons or travelers, wagons, carts, horses, or cattle as aforesaid. And we do further give and grant unto the said John Harris, his executors, administrators, and assigns, during the term of this grant, to take and receive from all persons passing over the said river, for themselves, wagons, carts, horses, attendance for the transporting, ferrying, or carrying over of all passengers, wagons, carts, horses, and cattle aforesaid, according to the true intent and meaning hereof, otherwise within this present grant, and every other matter and thing contained therein, shall cease, determine, and be void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

"Witness James Hamilton, Esquire, Lieutenant-Governor of the said province, who by virtue of certain powers and authorities to him for this purpose inter alia granted by the said proprietaries, hath hereunto set his hand and caused the great seal of the said province to be hereunto affixed at Philadelphia, this fifth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and fifty-three, the twenty-sixth year of the reign of King George ye second over Great Britain &c., and ye thirty-fifth year of ye sd. Proprietaries government.

"JAMES HAMILTON. [L. S.]"

In 1766, John Harris erected the large stone house on Front Street below Mulberry. Three years were consumed in its construction, and, as may be supposed, it was a remarkable house at that time. The following representation is as it appeared in 1850. The building remained in the possession of one or another of the Harris family until about 1838, when it was purchased by Col. Thomas Elder, and at his death by the Rev. Beverly R. Waugh, in 1855, for the use of the Pennsylvania Female College, of which he was principal. The executors of Rev. Waugh's estate sold it to Gen. Simon Cameron, who remodeled it in many particulars, although the building presents almost the same appearance it did originally.

In the General History many facts have been given relating to occurrences during the French and Indian and the Revolutionary wars which form a portion of the history of Harrisburg proper, to which our readers are referred. It is not easily surmised how many persons resided at Harris' Ferry, but there can be no doubt that as early as 1755 there was a cluster of houses in the neighborhood, and when the founder, John Harris, Jr., was induced to lay out a town at Harris' Ferry there was quite a thriving settlement. In the Philadelphia newspapers of 1784, however, we find the following advertisement:

"HARRISBURG.

"A NEW TOWN.

"The subscriber having laid out a Town on the banks of the Susquehanna, adjoining the Ferry (commonly called Harris' Ferry), he now offers for sale or on ground rent, for such term of years as may be agreed upon, a number of LOTS in said town. This spot of ground seems designed by nature for the seat of a town; its healthy, pleasant, high situation; its easy communication by water with a great part of the country; its lying on the main road through the Continent, and from Philadelphia to Fort Pitt, and all the back country, points it out as one of the most convenient and best spots for a town in the interior parts of the State of Pennsylvania. The town may be accommodated with a very fine dock at a small expense, there being a natural canal, defended on both sides by limestone banks at its entrance into the Susquehanna, where boats and crafts will lay safe at all times. There being a great deal of fine clay for making bricks and earthen ware, also a great plenty of wood, which will be furnished on very low terms, encouragement will be given to brick-makers, potters, and other tradesmen. For terms apply to

"JOHN HARRIS."

The same year John Harris made the following proposals to the General Assembly, which was quite opportune, for the question of the formation of a new county from the upper part of Lancaster County was agitating that body, and these proposals no doubt tended greatly to influence the Assembly in selecting Harris' Ferry as the seat of justice:

"PHILADELPHIA, March 3, 1784.

"Proposals of John Harris for the laying out of a Town on his Land, on the River Susquehanna.

"That the said John Harris will immediately (if encouraged by Government) lay out a Town of Two hundred lots, on the high grounds above his present dwelling house, the lots of about the Quantity of a Quarter of an acre each, in such form, with respect to streets, lanes and alleys, as the Commissioners may approve, a large street to be left for Publick landings along the River side. That the said John Harris agrees that the Honorable Assembly of this Commonwealth shall appoint Commissioners to value his said lots, after reserving Twenty Lots for his own use: That the s'd John Harris will convey all the streets, lanes and alleys to the inhabitants of s'd Town, and will convey to proper Commissioners a lot for a Court House & Jail, and a square of Four Acres to the State of Pennsylvania, for such purposes as the Government may apply the same: the applyers to have it at their choice to take the lots on a reasonable Groundrent, or to purchase the fee simple of the same: The Commissioners in both cases to be Judges: That as soon as the s'd Two Hundred lots are built on or disposed of, should there be a further demand for lots, the s'd John Harris engages, that the Publick shall be accommodated at a reasonable rate.

"JOHN HARRIS."

During that month (March, 1784) occurred the great ice-flood, and which came very near operating seriously as to the distinction which awaited it the following year. This terrible inundation was caused by the ice moving early in the winter, when, by a sudden change of weather, the river fell rapidly, and left the ice in large masses on Cox's and other islands above the present city, and in shoal water. The weather became intensely cold, so cold that the water did not drop off the houses for six weeks. The masses of ice froze to the bottom of the river. In March the river rose suddenly. At first the ice was immovable, and before it gave way the water reached the height of four feet in the first story of the brick house occupied at present by L. N. Ott, five miles above Harrisburg, and at the stone house (then Foulk's) near Dr. Heck's saw-mill the water was about two feet deep in the parlor. A log mill on the McAllister farm was carried off and landed behind Rockville. Two houses in Coxestown were taken off. Large quantities of water and ice passed down Paxtang Creek, and immense deposits of ice were made between Harris' Ferry (now Paxtang Street) and Pifer's Hill, on the east side of the creek, which (the late Thomas Elder said) laid until the month of May. This flood deterred John Harris from laying out the town on the low grounds below his stone house.

In 1785 the new county of Dauphin was formed. In fulfillment of his proposition to the General Assembly the following conveyance from John Harris to the commissioners was drawn up by William Maclay, his son-in-law. This conveyance, of the date of the 6th of July, 1785, recites :

... By virtue of which said several grants, devices, and conveyances the title to the land on which the town of Harrisburg, in the county of Dauphin, is situated is legally vested in the said John Harris, his heirs, and assigns; And whereas in and by a certain bond or obligation duly executed by the said John Harris to the State of Pennsylvania for the sum of five thousand pounds lawful monies of the same State bearing date the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, conditioned for the faithful performance of all and singular the agreements, promises, engagements, articles, matters, and things which he had therein undertaken to do and perform, among other things did covenant to, and with Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, as follows: Whereas the Representatives of the freemen of the said Commonwealth in General Assembly met, in and by a certain bill before them now depending, have resolved to erect part of the county of Lancaster into a separate county to be known and called by the name of the county of Dauphin, and that the seat of Justice in the said county of Dauphin shall be fixed at or near the place of the said John Harris' residence, and that Joshua Elder, Jacob Awl, Andrew Stewart, William Brown, and James Cowden, or any three of them shall be commissioners for certain purposes, in the said bill mentioned; And Whereas the said John Harris is in order to promote the good intentions of the said General Assembly in fixing the seat of Justice at the said place, to enable the said commissioners to regulate the laying out a county town there to public advantage, and to promote the more speedy settlement thereof by a liberal encouragement to purchasers hath promised, covenanted, and agreed to, and with the said commissioners, that as soon as the said bill shall be passed into a law he, the said John Harris, will without delay lay out two hundred lots containing about one-quarter-acre each on the high grounds near his present dwelling-house on the bank of the river Susquehanna as a site for the said county town, and that with the same lots shall be laid out such streets, lanes, and alleys as the said commissioners or a majority of them shall direct, which streets shall be confirmed for public use forever; and that he will also lay out a large street along the river for public landing places; And Whereas the said John Harris in consideration of the promises and other good causes hath also promised, covenanted, and agreed to and with the said intended commissioners that in case the said bill shall be passed into a law he will upon request convey to the said commissioners, or any three of them and their heirs a good and sufficient lot of ground for erecting a Court-House and jail thereon in trust for the use of the inhabitants of the said county of Dauphin. [Here follows a quotation from the act erecting the new county.] "Now this indenture witnesseth that in consideration of the premises and for and in consideration of the sum of five shillings lawful money of Pennsylvania to them the said John Harris and Mary his wife in hand paid by the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown at and before the enrolling and delivery of these presents the receipt of which sum of five shillings they the said John Harris and Mary his wife do hereby acknowledge, and thereof, and every thereof do acquit release the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown their and each of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and every of them have granted, bargained, sold, released, enfeoffed, and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, alien, release, enfeoff, and confirm unto the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, their heirs and assigns, all the streets, lanes, alleys, or highways as laid out by the commissioners of, in, and for the town of Harrisburg aforesaid, in the county of Dauphin, the butts, boundaries, courses, distances, length, and breadth thereof are as follows: [Front, Paxtang, Second, Market, Third, Pine, Locust, Walnut, Chestnut, and Mulberry Streets, River, Raspberry, Barbara, Cranberry, Strawberry, Blackberry, and Cherry Alleys are here described.] "And in consideration of the further sum of five shillings lawful money aforesaid to them the said John Harris and Mary his wife in hand well and truly paid by the said Jacob Awl, Andrew Stewart, Joshua Elder, James Cowden, and William Brown, the receipt thereof is hereby acknowledged and thereof and every part thereof the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, their and each of their heirs are fully acquitted and forever discharged, have granted, bargained, sold, released, aliened, enfeoffed, and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, alien, release, enfeoff, and confirm unto them the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, their heirs and assigns four certain lots of ground in the aforesaid town of Harrisburg, marked on the general plan of said town Nos. 120, 121, 142, 143, situated and bounded as follows: Beginning at a corner where Raspberry Alley intersects Market Street, thence along the line of Market Street to the line that divides lots Nos. 141 and 142; thence on the same division line crossing Strawberry Alley to Walnut Street; thence on the line of Walnut Street to Raspberry Alley; thence down the line of said alley to the place of beginning."

Other conveyances were made at the same date, one of which refers to the "Ferry Lot," that "in consideration of the sum of five shillings," John and Mary Harris also conveyed to Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, in trust for the use of the public, "a certain lot of ground in the town of Harrisburg called and known as the 'Ferry Lot,' beginning at a post marked for a corner on the line of Front Street, thence north 37 degrees east 10 perches to a corner; thence 53 degrees west 4 perches to a corner; thence south 37 degrees west 10 perches to the place of beginning, containing one quarter of an acre, together with all and singular the rights, liberties, privileges, hereditaments, and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging."

With these conveyances was a map or draft of the town, a copy of which, made a few years subsequent, is reproduced for this volume. The original plan included all the ground inclosed within the following lines: From the Susquehanna River out Mulberry Street to Dewberry Alley, up to Cherry Alley, out to Fourth Street, up to Walnut Street, into High Street (which was laid out back of the old arsenal), up to the Maclay line on the lower side of South Street, then in to the river, and down to the beginning, and is certified to in the following words:

"We, the subscribed commissioners appointed to carry into effect the proposals of John Harris respecting the laying out of the county town for the county of Dauphin, do hereby make known that the said town, with respect to the size of the lots, disposition of the streets, lanes and alleys, and the choice of the public grounds, was laid out under our direction and inspection agreeably to the adjoining plan of the said town, the said lots in general containing about one quarter of an acre each, and extending in front 52½ feet with a depth of 210 feet, with some unavoidable variations in particular courses, as may easily be seen by inspection, the whole being laid down from a scale of 200 feet to an inch. Witness our hands the 14th day of April, 1785.

"JACOB AWL, "JOSHUA ELDER,
"ANDREW STEWART, "JAMES COWDEN,
"WILLIAM BROWN."

Another conveyance was made at the same time (July 6, 1785) by Harris to the commissioners, in trust for the use of the commonwealth in case the seat of government should be fixed at Harrisburg, four acres and twenty-one perches of land, being that portion of the Capitol Park south of the South Street line. The deed conveying this trust recites:

"In consideration of the sum of five shillings, grant, bargain, sell, release, and enfeoff, and confirm unto Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, their heirs and assigns, in trust for public use, and such purposes as the Legislature shall hereafter direct, a certain lot or piece of ground, situated in the said town of Harriensburg, in the said county of Dauphin, marked on the general plan of the said town 'Public Ground,' situated and bounded as follows: Beginning at a post marked for a corner on the lines of Third and Walnut Streets; thence along the said Walnut Street north thirty-seven degrees east seventeen perches and a quarter to a post marked for a corner; thence north thirty-five degrees west thirty-one perches to a black oak; thence south fifty-seven degrees west twenty-three perches to a post marked for a corner on the line of Third Street; thence down the said street south forty-five degrees east thirty-seven perches to the place of beginning."

Deed Book A contains many conveyances of John Harris, and we must give him credit for his care and watchfulness over the interests of the future people of the godly town which would bear his name. The first John Harris died in December, 1748, and was buried in the inclosure on the bank of the Susquehanna. The deed of conveyance of this burial-lot by the commissioners is as follows:

"This indenture, made the twenty-eighth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, between Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, all of the county of Dauphin and Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, gentlemen, of the one part, and John Harris, of Harrisburg, county and State aforesaid, of the other part, witnesseseth: That the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, in consideration of the sum of five shillings, lawful money of Pennsylvania, to them in hand well and truly paid by the said John Harris, at and before the execution of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and from the payment thereof the said John Harris, his heirs, executors, administrators, assigns are fully acquitted and forever discharged, have granted, bargained, sold, released, enfeoffed, and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, and release, enfeoff, and confirm unto him, the said John Harris, his heirs and assigns, a certain lot of ground, situate on the common or front strand of the town of Harrisburg, where John Harris was buried, beginning at a mulberry-tree on the southwest side of the stone dwelling-house of the said John Harris, thence from the said mulberry-tree on the north side so as to contain fifteen feet square, together with all and singular the rights, liberties, privileges, hereditaments, and appurtenances whatsoever to the same belong or in anywise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, use, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, of them, the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, of, in, and to the same, to have and to hold the said lot and premises hereby granted or mentioned, or intended so to be, with the appurtenances unto him, the said John Harris, his heirs and assigns, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of him, the said John Harris, his heirs and assigns, forever; and the said Jacob Awl, Joshua Elder, Andrew Stewart, James Cowden, and William Brown, for themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, do covenant, grant, and agree, to and with the said John Harris, his heirs and assigns, the said described lot of ground, hereditaments, and appurtenances against them, the said grantors, their heirs and assigns, and against all and every other person and persons lawfully claiming, or to claim by, from, or under them, or either of them, jointly and severally warrant and forever defend by these presents. In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have interchangeably set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

In more recent years the descendants of John Harris secured from the borough authorities an additional five feet of ground, thus making the graveyard twenty feet square, which they surrounded by a handsome iron railing. With all these conveyances by the proprietor for the benefit of the present city, the county, and the State, it would be only a mark of gratitude to place some befitting memorial of the good founder of the town where the ashes of the old pioneer, whom the former so highly revered, repose.

The late George Washington Harris, in one of the early directories (Napey's) of the town, gave the following data concerning the town when first laid out:

"When the town was first laid out the old orchard belonging to the mansion house extended up to about the line of Mulberry Street. About the intersection of Mulberry Street with Second Street was a ridge, from which the ground descended from six to ten feet to the present Market Square, and the water ran from the square upwards and into the river along the channel which is under the bridge now erected across Front Street above Walnut. At this time the ground above Market Street was chiefly in woods.

"Mr. Robert Harris, who died in the year 1851, frequently saw several bears killed in the river in one day. In the fall of the year they would come down from the mountains to the cornfields, and were quite abundant in the neighborhood. It was quite common to see them while riding along the roads. The farmers when going out to plow would frequently take their guns to guard against their depredations. On one occasion Mr. Robert Harris with his sister, Mrs. Hanna, were playing at the river near the mouth of the run at the end of Walnut Street. A thicket of bushes extended up along the run. Some boys came running from a barn on the bank and told them that two bears were coming down the run. They scampered up the bank, when presently the bears came along and took into the river.

"On another occasion a man named Rennick, with some others, went in pursuit of a bear. When the canoe approached near to it, Rennick made a stroke at the bear with his socket-pole, but missed it. He either lost his balance or was drawn overboard by the weight of the pole, and the bear struck him with his paw and tore his cheek open.

"Wild turkeys were also abundant here at this period. John Harris shot wild turkeys from the door of his store-house. Beaver and otter were then and afterwards killed along Paxton Creek and on the islands in the neighborhood.

"The town as laid out by John Harris extended as far down the bank as Mulberry Street, and the lot on the corner of Front and Mulberry Streets, owned by the heirs of Valentine Egle, was No. 1 on the plan of the town. In the course of a few years afterwards extended the plan down to Mary's Alley, which bounds the store-house lot on the upper side. His executors, in 1792, extended the plan of lots farther down.

"There is no house, except the Harris mansion on Front Street, yet standing within the limits of Harrisburg which is certainly known to have been erected before the town was laid out.

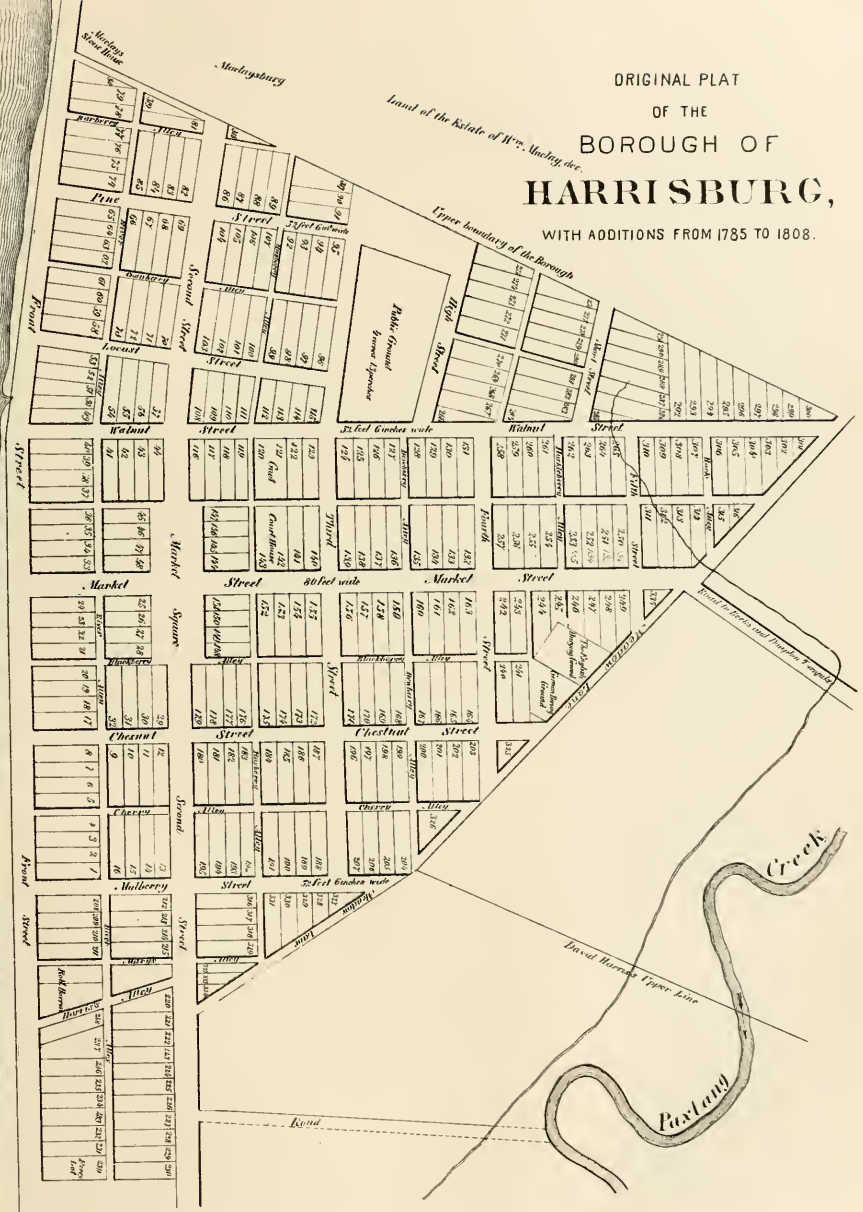

"John Hamilton erected the first permanent establishment to the town, after Harris' stone house, by building a brick house at the upper corner of Front Street and Blackberry Alley and the large establishment for his store on the corner of Market Square and Market Street, which was known a few years ago as the 'Washington House,' but since replaced by a new structure, termed the 'Jones House.' Mr. Hamilton carried on an extensive trade with the Western settlers. In place of the present rapid mode of conveying merchandise and passengers to Pittsburgh, he kept large numbers of horses and mules, and every few weeks his caravans set out for the West, laden with salt, powder, lead, &c.

"The first clergyman established in the town was Rev. Joseph Montgomery, a Presbyterian. His first discourse, it is said, was delivered in the lot where recently stood the ruins of the Presbyterian Church on a pleasant afternoon in the month of June. The congregation—the entire village—were sheltered by two or three large apple-trees and some noble oaks, the primitive growth of the forest.

"Chief Justice McKean resided here for some time, at least when Congress sat at York. He lived in a substantial one-story log house, a short distance above what is now Locust Street. He wore an immense cocked hat, and had great deference shown him by the country people and the straggling Indians, who had their village a short distance from the town. When he and the other judges of the Supreme Court came to the town to hold court numbers of the citizens would go out on horseback to meet them and escort them to town. Sometimes one or two hundred people would attend on this occasion. And each morning while the chief justice was in town holding court the sheriff and constables escorted him from his lodgings to the court-room. When on the bench he sat with his cocked hat on, and was dressed in a scarlet gown."

The town was called by the founder HARRISBURG, and the minutes of the second court held in the town are dated Harrisburg. On the 3d of August, 1786, the following appears: "The name of the County Town or Seat of the Courts is altered from Harrisburg to Louisburgh in consequence of the Supreme Executive Council of the Commonwealth so styling it in the commissions of the Justices of the said Town." This was surely a piece of impertinence. When the act of Assembly was passed in 1785 establishing Dauphin County, it fixed the seat of government near Harris' Ferry. As John Harris had laid out the town, and offered lots therein for county purposes, the privilege was accorded him of naming the town. But Chief Justice Thomas McKean and some other of the judges of the Supreme Court conceived the notion that as the town was called after the Dauphin of France, the town should be called Louisburgh, after Louis XVI. At this time the prejudices of the people ran high in favor of France for the aid that kingdom had given America during the Revolution. Besides, Judge McKean and John Harris had had a personal difficulty, which occurred about the time the former was leaving Harrisburg, after his residence here; and, perhaps, being influenced by motives of hostility towards Mr. Harris, Mr. McKean strongly urged that the town should be called Louisburgh. Accordingly, in the first precept for holding the courts here the court was directed to be held at Louisburgh. John Harris, however, told the judges that they might "Louisburgh" as much as they pleased, but that he would never execute a title for any lot in any other name than that of Harrisburg, and his determination prevailed.

In September, 1786, occurred the "Pumpkin flood." The bottom lands on the head-waters of the river, and especially of the North Branch and in New York State, had been planted principally with pumpkins. These came down in enormous quantities. Esquire Montgomery, who was a clerk in the recorder's office as early as 1790, frequently stated that "for two whole days the river looked as if a person could walk over it on pumpkins." Small houses, hay-stacks, grain-stacks, with chickens on them, etc., came down in great numbers.

There is a question in regard to the height of the water at that flood compared with the flood of 1865. It is supposed the water attained about the same level in each. In the Pumpkin flood flats passed from Harris' Ferry across Second Street to the hills. At that time there was a brick-yard north of Paxtang Street east of the canal above the old creek bridge.

The sheds were probably on the highest spot. In that flood the only part of the sheds visible was the comb. At the bank of the river in front of Chestnut Street, before the filling up done of late years, there was a first and second bank; the first bank has been almost obliterated. The "Pumpkin flood" was about half-way between the first and second bank. In 1826, when the engineers were locating the Pennsylvania Canal on the ground between Paxtang Street and the mouth of the creek, Abraham Bombaugh, who had seen both the floods of 1784 and 1786, told them they were locating the canal too low; they seemed surprised, but he told them that he had seen the water over the whole of that ground deep enough to drown them where they stood.

The population of the town must have increased wonderfully. In the assessment for 1785 the return for Lower Paxtang included Harrisburg, and it is only in 1787 that the assessments of Louisburgh and Middletown appear distinctively from the rural portion of that township. One hundred and forty-three names are recorded in Louisburgh, showing a population of about six hundred persons. The words in brackets are necessary additions to the original for a proper understanding of the list.

CHAPTER II.

Harrisburg in 1787.—In 1788—The Federal Seat of Government—Harrisburg erected into a Borough—First Assessment of the Borough—Whiskey Insurrection—Address of the Burgesses to President Washington, and his Reply.

In July, 1787, the Rev. Manasseh Cutler, on his way to the Ohio, passed through Harrisburg, and left this description of the place in his journal: "This is a beautiful town. It contains about one hundred houses, all built in less than three years, many of them brick, some of them three story, built in the Philadelphia style; all appear very neat. A great number of taverns, with handsome signs; houses all two-story; large windows. About one-half of the people are English. People were going to meeting; they meet in private houses; have no churches yet. People appear very well dressed, some gay." This was the second year from the founding of the town, and is a pretty good description of the place at that time. Middletown and Lebanon were larger towns, but the location of the county-seat at Harrisburg gave an impetus to its growth and prosperity, and it was in a few years ahead of its rivals, and has rapidly maintained its supremacy.

The next account of Harrisburg is in April, 1788, when John Penn, son of Thomas Penn, and grandson of William Penn, made a journey from Philadelphia to Carlisle to look after some of the Proprietary estates there. He set out from Philadelphia on the 6th of April, 1788, on horseback, reached Reading the next day, where he tarried until the 9th, when he pursued his way towards the Susquehanna. We now quote from his journal:

"April 10. Rose by six o'clock, and after breakfast set out in order to sleep at Harrisburg, the chief town of Dauphin County, and which was proposed to be the seat of government. Passed some mills a few miles from thence, at Tulpehocken Creek, which afterwards meets the road somewhat farther in a very picturesque spot. On the eastern side of this is a most elegant new Lutheran Church. On the western is a Calvinist's, called here, by way of distinction, a Presbyterian, Church. After riding through a village I came to Lebanon, a handsome town, containing some hundred inhabitants. This place is decorated by a spire, and the houses are well built, many of them stone or brick. It is not being distant enough, the horses were baited at Millerstown, a small village half-way, and twenty miles from Harrisburg, or Harris's Ferry. About sunset I had a fine view of this town from an high part of the road, the river Susquehanna flowing between its woody and cultivated banks close to the town. Mr. Harris, the owner and founder of this town, informed me that three years ago there was but one house built, and seemed to possess that pride and pleasure in his success which Æneas envied.

"Though the courts are held here generally, Lebanon is infinitely larger. The situation of this place is one of the finest I ever saw. One good point of view is the tavern, almost close to the river. This was the house which stood alone so many years. It is called the Compass, and is one of the first public-houses in Pennsylvania. The room I had is twenty-two feet square, and high in proportion.

"April 11. After breakfasting, about eight, with Mr. Harris, we walked together to the ferry, when he gave me two pieces of information, one of an island he purchased of us, which the war prevented us from confirming to him, and the other of the delinquency of one Litsa, who wishes to detain the money due in part for a farm over the Susquehanna, though there is an incumbrance in our favor on it to the amount of six or seven hundred pounds, going on upon interest. The waters being high, we ferried across with difficulty, and almost dropped down to a very rapid part below the landing place, but at length escaped a disagreeable situation. About two miles from the river passed the house of Whitehall, the Assemblyman, and arrived about three at Carlisle, seventeen miles off."

Mr. Penn remained at Carlisle until the 13th, when he commenced his return to Philadelphia. He thus proceeds:

"April 13. Rose early in order to see a cave near Conegoquin Creek, in which water petrifies as it drops from the roof. Returned and pursued my route to a place called Lisburn, tho' it proved somewhat out of my way. Just at this spot the country is romantic. The name of the creek running thro' it, Yellow-breeches Creek, may, indeed, be unworthy of it. From hence the road lay thro' woods till the Susquehanna, and Harrisburg at a distance, denoted that the ferry was at hand. I crossed the river about three and a half o'clock, surrounded by enchanting prospects. The ride to Middletown is along the eastern bank, and exhibits a striking example of the great, in the opposite one, rising to a vast height, and wooded close to the water's edge for many miles. From this vast forest, and the expansive bed of the river navigable to its source for craft carrying two tons burdens, the ideas of grandeur and immensity rush forcibly upon the mind, mixed with the desert-wilderness of an uninhabited scene. The first particular object on this road is Simpson's house, the owner of the ferry where I crossed. It is on a rock across the river. At Middletown I put up at one More's, who was a teacher formerly at Philadelphia of Latin and Greek. He talked very sensibly, chiefly on subjects which discovered him to be a warm Tory, and friend of passive obedience. Unlike many Tories, he is an enemy of the new Constitution. Here the Great Swatara joins the Susquehanna, and a very fine mill is kept at their confluence by Mr. Frey, a Dutchman, to whom I carried a letter from Mr. D. Clymer.

"Several trees, before I arrived at the Susquehanna ferry, had been girdled, as it is termed, that is, cut all around thro' the bark, so as to prevent their continuing alive. This operation in a country so abounding in timber, saves the too great trouble of cutting down every tree whose leaves might obstruct the men's operation upon the cove.

"April 14. Before my departure Mr. Frey showed me his excellent mill and still more extraordinary mill-stream, running from one part of the Swatara for above a mile till it rejoins it at the mouth. It was cut by himself, with great expense and trouble, and is the only work of the kind in Pennsylvania. Middletown is in a situation as beautiful as it is adapted to trade, and already of a respectable size. I left it threatened by rain, which came on rather violently soon after, and the roads proved the worst of the whole journey, till that time. I passed thro' Elizabeth-town, eight miles off, and over the creeks (or small rivers) of Conewago and Chickieslunga. As you leave Dauphin for Lancaster County, the lands improve, and at a place half-way from Middletown, where I stopped for my horses, and to avoid the rain, it was said to be worth £15 per acre. There are some handsome farm-houses nearer Lancaster. The town itself has a far superior appearance to any I had passed thro'. The streets are regular, and the sides are paved with brick, like Philadelphia, or else stone; and separated by posts from the street."

The question of fixing, permanently, the seat of the Federal government, began to occupy public attention shortly after the close of the Revolutionary war; and was strongly agitated in the Congress of 1789, then in session at New York. The question was first submitted to the House of Representatives of that body in the shape of the following resolution, which, with the subsequent information, the author gleans from the Pennsylvania Packet, published at Philadelphia, in the year above stated:

"Resolved, That a permanent seat for the government of the United States ought to be fixed as near the centre of wealth, population and extent of territory as shall be consistent with the convenience of the Atlantic navigation, having also a due regard to the circumstances of the western country." Adopted.

Mr. Goodhue observed that the members from the Eastern and Northern States had contemplated the subject of a permanent seat of the Federal Government with deliberation. They had turned their eyes to different parts of the country, and had at last, after a mutual and full consultation, come to an agreement that the banks of the Susquehanna was as far south and as near the centre of the population and extent of territory as was consistent with other circumstances important to the country. They felt disposed to be governed by principles of accommodation, and were of opinion that the banks of the Susquehanna ought to be chosen for the permanent residence of Congress. He concluded by reading a resolution to this effect.

Mr. Hartley supported the resolution, and pointed out Wright's Ferry as an eligible place.

Mr. Lee moved to amend, by fixing the seat of government on the Potomac instead of the Susquehanna. Not agreed to,—year 20, says 31.

Mr. Madison proposed to amend, by leaving it discretionary to be either on the Potomac or the Susquehanna. Not agreed to,—year 20, says 31.

On a subsequent day the House of Representatives, in committee of the whole, proceeded to consider the resolution of Mr. Goodhue, which read as follows:

"Resolved, In the opinion of this committee, that the permanent seat of government of the United States ought to be at some convenient place on the east bank of the Susquehanna River, in the State of Pennsylvania, etc."

Mr. Hiester moved to insert after the words "Susquehanna River" the words "between Harrisburg and Middletown, inclusive."

A lengthy and spirited debate occurred, participated in by nearly all the principal members of the House, those from the Northern and Eastern States generally favoring the amendment, and those from the South opposing it. The amendment was finally lost.

Several other amendments were proposed and lost, and the original resolution was carried.

In committee of the whole House next day it was resolved that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to borrow the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be repaid in twenty years, with five per cent. interest, for the purpose of erecting the necessary buildings on the bank of the Susquehanna.

Mr. Fitzsimmons moved for the "appointment of commissioners to examine and report upon the most eligible situation for the public buildings on the Susquehanna, and that they be authorized, by and with the advice of the President, to purchase such quantity of lands as may be thought necessary," etc.

Mr. Hartley said the State of Pennsylvania, both by its convention and Legislature, had made the cession of the jurisdiction by Congress over any district of ten miles square in the State that might be selected for the seat of government.

The resolution of Mr. Fitzsimmons, after being so amended as to make the acts of the commissioners subject to the approval or rejection by the President, was adopted,—year 28, says 21.

The resolution went to the Senate, which body struck out all relating to the Susquehanna, and inserted a clause fixing the permanent seat of government at Germantown, Pa.

The House at first agreed to the clause, but refused to concur with some subsequent action of the Senate thereon, and pending the further consideration of the subject, Congress adjourned sine die for that year.

At the session of 1790 the question was again brought before Congress, and created an intense excitement throughout the country. The Northern and Eastern members were strenuous in their efforts to prevent the seat of government being located south of the Susquehanna River, while, on the other hand, the Southern and Western members were just as active in their labors to prevent it being located on the Susquehanna, or at any point north or east of that river. The vote on the question was divided equally. Finally this sectional feeling became so strong as to endanger the safety of the Union itself, and Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, and other patriots earnestly sought to effect a compromise, but were unsuccessful. At last, by changing the votes of one or two of the Northern members, brought about through the instrumentality of Mr. Jefferson, a bill, pretty much in the shape of that proposed at the previous session, passed Congress fixing the site of the seat of government on the banks of the Potomac, at such place as should be selected by commissioners under the direction of the President.

The act to erect the town of Harrisburg into a borough was passed on the 13th day of April, 1791, and an act to alter the same without interfering with the boundaries originally laid down was approved Feb. 1, 1808, on the ground "that experience has fully proved that, owing to a difference in the local situation of the places, and various other causes, the act of Assembly for erecting the town of Reading into a borough, however applicable to the purposes for which it was originally intended by the Legislature, is not well calculated for the good government of the borough of Harrisburg; therefore be it enacted that the said town of Harrisburg shall continue and forever remain a borough, under the name and title of the 'Borough of Harrisburg;' the extent and limits of which shall be the same as in the original law, to wit: Beginning at low water mark on the eastern shore of the Susquehanna River; thence by the pine-apple-tree north sixty degrees and one quarter east seventy-nine perches to an ash-tree on the west bank of Paxtang Creek; thence by the several corners thereof three hundred and twenty-three perches to a white hickory on William Maclay's line; thence by the same south sixty-seven and three-quarter degrees west two hundred and twelve perches to a marked chestnut-oak on the eastern bank of the Susquehanna; thence by the same course to low water mark to the place of beginning."

On the 16th day of May, 1791, the court records contain the following: "The name of the county town is altered to Harrisburg in pursuance to an act of Assembly creating it into a borough under that name, passed 13th of April, 1791." Thus at last justice was done the founder of the town. To George Hoyer belongs the credit of being the first Burgess of the borough of Harrisburg. The minutes, however, of the early borough councils are not to be found, and, save in the files of early newspapers yet preserved, little is known of the workings of that legislative body.

John Harris, the founder of Harrisburg, died July 29, 1791, and is buried in the graveyard of Paxtang Church. He was sixty-five years of age.

On the 4th of February, 1792, the following preamble and resolution "was made and seconded by Mr. Potts and Mr. Hanna" in the General Assembly, looking towards the incorporation of a company for the establishing a manufactory in Harrisburg. More properly it was for affording facilities therefor by the construction of a canal from Hunter's Falls. The bed of this canal was to be Paxtang Creek. The resolution passed, a bill was matured and presented, but the fear of impeding the navigation of the Susquehanna by a shot-wing dam, which was deemed necessary by the projectors of this scheme, occasioned its defeat. This plan was, nevertheless, considered for a long time a feasible one. Harrisburg was undoubtedly then, as it is now, a desirable point for the establishment of manufactories, and had any one of the numerous plans for supplying water-power to the town been carried out, there can be no doubt that it would have added greatly to its wealth and prosperity:

"As the attention of the Citizens of the United States are now very properly engaged in promoting many useful improvements for increasing the wealth and happiness of the people of each particular State; and the recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and others who have lately published their Sentiments on the subject have clearly demonstrated the great advantages which must result from establishing Manufactories in this Country; to engross the time of this House with Arguments in their favour, would be entirely superfluous. It is only necessary to suggest some of the many concurring circumstances which point out the Borough of Harrisburg, as a very eligible place for that purpose, not only as being on the waters of an extensive inland navigation, where the raw materials for different kinds of Manufactories may be obtained with great ease and plenty, and the reduced price of provisions, occasioned by the distance from foreign navigation, will always contribute to an equal reduction in the price of labor; but also, the great ease with which the waters of Susquehanna may be brought out of that River at or near Hunter's falls, along Paxtang Creek, for the Accommodation of the Borough, and to provide a sufficient force in aid of manual Labour, in every branch of Manufactory which will admit of machinery assistance, in the most extensive manner.

"Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to enquire into the propriety, to bring in a Bill to be passed into a Law, to authorize the Governor to incorporate a Company for establishing a manufactory in the Borough of Harrisburg, and for opening a Canal between the River Susquehanna, at or near Hunter's falls, and Paxtang Creek; and for extending the said Manufactory, to Linoea, Cotton, and such other branches, as they may hereafter find useful and advantageous."

In 1791, when the town was incorporated, the names had grown to two hundred and twenty, and the words "Ferry" and "Louisburgh" disappear from the record.

In 1792 we have the first borough assessment (taken in 1791):

arrival," says the Oracle, "the citizens of the town, with their usual degree of affection to the sons of liberty and patriotism, voluntarily opened their doors for their reception." The next morning they crossed the Susquehanna, on their way to Carlisle, after expressing their satisfaction in the following manner:

"The commander of the Jersey militia detachment feels himself bound to acknowledge the politeness of the citizens of Harrisburg to his company, and requests that their gratitude and his own, joined with the highest respect, may be signified in a proper manner.

"RICHARD HOWELL,

"Commandant Jersey detachment.

"HARRISBURG, Sept. 25, 1794."

Alexander Graydon, in his "Memoirs," then a resident of Harrisburg, and an officer of the county, gives the following mention of occurrences at this time:

"The Western Expedition, as it was called, gave me an opportunity of seeing a number of my old friends from Philadelphia; and it afforded also a momentary triumph to the poor handful of Harrisburg Federalists, who were stated by their opponents to amount to only five.

"A French flag which had been flying at the court-house, then building, had been the cause of some squabbling in the newspaper; and this flag was perpetually ordered to be taken down by the troops from the city. Had I been disposed for revenge, I might upon this occasion have been fully gratified, as I was repeatedly asked who had caused it to be put up, and impliedly censured for giving evasive answers to the questions, which, from their manner, evinced a disposition to treat the authors of it much more roughly than would have been agreeable to me.

"Conspicuous among the crowd that rolled out to the eastward was Governor Mifflin. On the day of his arrival he convened the people at the market-house and gave them an animated harangue, in which there was nothing exceptional save a monstrous suggestion that the British had stirred up the discontents to the westward and been the cause of the present opposition to the government."

On Friday, October 3d, the President of the United States, Gen. George Washington, arrived at Harrisburg. Apprised of his arrival, all the troops then in the town, on their way westward, marched some distance to meet him and escort him to his quarters in the borough. The joy of the citizens was unbounded, and the burgesses presented the following address:

"To His Excellency, George Washington, President of the United States of America:

"Sir,—We, the Burgesses and citizens of Harrisburg, while we rejoice in the opportunity of presenting our respects to a character so justly revered and dear to Americans, cannot but lament that we should owe it to an interruption of the peace and prosperity of our country, those constant objects of our public care. We trust, however, that the just indignation which fires the breasts of all virtuous citizens at the unprovoked outrages committed by these lawless men, who are in opposition to one of the mildest and most equal of governments of which the condition of man is susceptible, will excite such exertions as to crush the spirit of disaffection wherever it has appeared, and that our political horizon will shine brighter than ever on a dispersion of the clouds which now menace and obscure it.

"Though our sphere of action is too limited to produce any important effects, yet we beg leave to assure your Excellency that, so far as it extends, our best endeavors shall not be wanting to support the happy constitution and wise administration of our government.

"Signed, in behalf of the borough,

"CONRAD BOBRAUGH,

"ALEX. BERRYHILL,

"Burgesses."

"HARRISBURG, Oct. 3, 1794.

The President, through Gen. Hamilton, returned the following reply:

In the general history reference is made to the participation of the county in the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794. Harrisburg at this time was an important point. From the Oracle of Dauphin we learn that on Friday, the 19th of September, three companies of horse, containing in all one hundred and thirty, arrived from Philadelphia, the whole under the command of Capt. John Dunlap. The company of light dragoons, commanded by Capt. John Irwin, of Harrisburg, the corps of light infantry, commanded by Capt. George Fisher, with the most distinguished officers of the county, were paraded, all in complete uniform, in order to receive them. After the usual ceremonies, the dragoons dismounted to refresh themselves, and on Monday morning they proceeded to Carlisle.

On Tuesday following, the 23d, some eighty regular troops; recruited in Massachusetts, commanded by Capt. Lyman, passed through Harrisburg to join Gen. Wayne's army in the Ohio country.

On Thursday, the 25th, a battalion of New Jersey volunteer dragoons, under the command of Gen. Richard Howell, Governor of that State, reached Harrisburg. They were well equipped and completely mounted. "It raining very rapidly on their

"To the Burgesses and other citizens of Harrisburg :

"GENTLEMEN,—In declaring to you the genuine satisfaction I derive from your very cordial support, I will not mingle any expression of the painful sensations which I experience from the occasion which has drawn me hither. You will be at no loss to do justice to my feelings. But relying on that kindness of Providence towards our country which every adverse appearance hitherto has served to manifest, and counting upon the tried good sense and patriotism of the great body of our fellow-citizens, I do not hesitate to indulge with you the expectation of such an issue as will serve to confirm the blessings we enjoy under a constitution that well deserves the confidence and support of virtuous and enlightened men. To class the inhabitants of Harrisburg among this number is only to bear testimony to the zealous and efficient exertions which they have made towards the defence of the laws.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

Among the soldiers who accompanied the troops to the westward was Maj. William Gould, of the New Jersey infantry. He kept a journal of the expedition, from which we quote what is of especial local value. It contains several important items of information,—the abounding of the Susquehanna with rock-fish, salmon, shad, and fowl,—that previous to the founding of the town in 1785 there were quite a number of houses and people here, and the existence of a public ferry distinct from either the lower or upper ferries, taking in the island in the transit :

"Thursday, October 2d.—Marched to Hummelstown, a handsome village with kind inhabitants; we were invited into their houses, and had good entertainment in taverns. Sixteen miles

"Friday, October 3d.—Marched one mile to a river called Sweet Arry; crossed on boats and marched to Harrisburg, and encamped on the banks of the Susquehanna River, a beautiful stream, abounding with rock-fish, salmon, and other small fish and fowl in abundance, also shad of the best kind in the season. The founder of this town, named Harris, buried in a stockade fort by reason that the Indians prevented burying in the graveyard. Twenty-five years ago there were but three or four houses, and now it contains more than three hundred, beautifully situated on the banks of the river, some elegant houses, good market and full stores, a county town in Dauphin County.

"At 3 o'clock P.M. paraded and marched to towa, from where we encamped; saluted the President of the United States who passed by, after which returned to camp. Col. Forman, Maj. Kipp, and myself accepted an invitation from the President to take a glass of wine with him, after which dined very agreeably, and returned to camp; the inhabitants received us with every mark of friendship; the artillery discharged fifteen guns at his entrance into town. Nine miles.

"Saturday, Oct. 4, 1794.—Marched to the Susquehanna ferry at revells in the morning with the First Battalion; crossed in boats to an island in the river, and from thence in other boats to the other side. Suffered much with cold in crossing, it being a very cold morning. The President, Geo. Washington, forded the river in a coach, drove it himself, etc."

CHAPTER III.

Sickness at Harrisburg—Laudin's Mill-Dam—the Source of Trouble—Meeting of the Citizens—Efforts to Purchase—Removal of the Nuisance—Mill-Dam Taxes.

In the autumn of 1792 there was considerable sickness at Harrisburg. In the succeeding year this was much greater and of a violent character. At this period the yellow fever was prevailing to an alarming extent at Philadelphia. Graydon, in his "Memoirs," thus alludes to the pestilence: "Measures were taken, says he, in almost every town and village to prohibit the entry of persons suspected of infection, and even fugitives from the seat of it, though in health, were regarded with a jealous eye. Some of the people of Harrisburg were for following the example of their neighbors, though a malady not less fatal than that in Philadelphia was raging among themselves. But the difference was that one was called a plague, the other but a simple fever. It is somewhat remarkable that if the yellow fever is of foreign origin, as insisted upon by many, that a disease of a similar type should make its appearance at the same time on the banks of the Susquehanna at the distance of an hundred miles. Shall we say that the state of the atmosphere which generated the one was favorable to the diffusion of the other? This, I believe, is the doctrine of those who contend that the yellow fever is of exotic growth, and always imparted when it appears among us. I would venture, however, no opinion on the subject. With respect to the mortality produced by the two diseases, that at Harrisburg was, I believe, in proportion to the population of the place as great as that at Philadelphia. I cannot take upon me minutely to describe the symptoms of the Harrisburg disease, nor were they the same in all that were sick, but a general one was an affection of the stomach, or nausea with violent reachings, and a yellowness of the skin. Some were ill a week, some longer, some died in two or three days from the time of their being seized, and others who were walking about with symptoms only of the ague suddenly took ill and expired. The black vomit, which has sometimes been supposed peculiar to the yellow fever, appeared in some cases. I was attacked with a quartan ague about the middle of September, but had none of the grievous symptoms of the malignant fever which prevailed.

"The matter which produces ague,—i.e., miasmata, caused by vapors from low and marshy situations and waters, rendered baneful from certain adventitious circumstances, may be pronounced to be the support or aliment of all diseases, more particularly of the latter perhaps, when the exhalations are rendered more than commonly noxious from the general state of the atmosphere;—this cause existed at Harrisburg. A mill-dam had been erected the season before on the Paxtang, rather a turbid and sluggish stream, within five or six hundred yards of the middle of the town on its eastern side. The obstruction must have spread the water over a surface of from eight to ten acres, and this co-operating with a state of the atmosphere unusually morbid this season in such situations may fully account for the fear which prevailed.

"In the fall of the year 1793 there were some cases of it, and still more in that of 1794, equally malignant, after which the mill-dam was removed. I have been the more particular on this subject, though without being able to offer anything satisfactory, from knowing it to have been a matter of some interest with the physicians of Philadelphia to ascertain the nature of the Harrisburg disease, thence to deduce data towards the solution of the question, whether the yellow fever, as appearing in our cities, be, or not, a malady of exclusively foreign origin?"

It appears that on the 16th of April, 1790, John Harris sold to Peter, John, and Abraham Landis a mill-seat, with the privileges of a dam and mill-race, containing three acres of land, situated in what is now the First Ward of the city, on Paxtang Creek. Subsequently the Messrs. Landis purchased an additional tract of land from Gen. John A. Hanna, and erected upon it a mill, etc. The citizens having decided that the fever was caused by the Landis mill-dam, took immediate and decisive measures to abate the nuisance. After some preliminary proceedings, a meeting of the citizens was held May 5, 1794, at the house of George Reitzel, and a committee appointed to wait on the Messrs. Landis to treat with them for the purchase of their mill, land, and appurtenances. On the following day the committee met and agreed to pay for the property two thousand five hundred pounds, as follows: fifteen hundred pounds in thirty days, and five hundred pounds on the 1st of May, 1795 and 1796, with interest. This proposition was immediately submitted to the Messrs. Landis, with the request that they inform the committee of their acceptance or rejection of the offer within a few days. To enable the committee to comply with the proposition for the purchase of the mill property, the following agreement was signed on the 7th of May, 1794:

"It is proposed by the Borough of Harrisburg to purchase the mill or mills now in the occupation of Abraham Landis on the waters of Paxtang Creek, together with the appurtenances thereto belonging, and to have the same conveyed to the said Borough as a fund to defray the taxes of the inhabitants forever.

"We, the subscribers, to enable the Burgesses to complete the said purchase and for the said considerations, do severally but not jointly bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators unto the said Burgesses for the time being and their successors in such sum or sums of money as may be annexed by us to our names, to be paid to the said Burgesses and their successors in the manner and at the time hereinafter specified, to wit: one moiety or half part on the first day of June next ensuing the date hereof, and the remaining moiety or half part in two equal annual payments from the said first day of June with lawful interest for the same. Provided, nevertheless, that if the said purchase should not be completed by or on behalf of the said Borough within one month from the date of these presents, that then the above obligation to be void and of no effect, otherwise to be and remain in full force and effect. In witness whereof we have severally hereto set our hands and affixed our seals this seventh day of May in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four:

In addition to the amount of money so raised, the heirs of John Harris, Messrs. David Harris, Robert Harris, William Maclay, and John A. Hanna paid sixteen hundred dollars, the purchase money, or perhaps something more than the amount which the Landises had paid for the property.

These proceedings did not, however, accomplish anything, as the Messrs. Landis refused to sell their property for the sum proposed by the citizens' committee. At a meeting of the inhabitants of the borough of Harrisburg on the 16th day of January, 1795, it was unanimously agreed "that two thousand and six hundred pounds be immediately assessed on the property of the citizens of the said borough; that one thousand and six hundred pounds of the said sum be collected on or before the 6th day of March next; that the remaining one thousand pounds be secured to be paid, with interest, in two equal annual instalments, and that the whole (to wit, the sixteen hundred pounds in cash and the residue in bonds) be tendered to Peter and Abraham Landis, or either of them, proprietors of the mill and other water-works, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, near the borough aforesaid, as a full compensation for their property in the same; and that in case they refused to accept the said sum as a full compensation for the said mill, with the appurtenances, that then we unanimously agree to prostrate the dam erected on the waters of Paxtaug Creek, for the purpose of conveying water to said mill, and pay our proportionable parts of all legal expenses and damages that may accrue on any suit or suits, indictment or indictments that may be brought or prosecuted in consequence of such act or acts."

A committee, consisting of Stacy Potts, Moses Gillmor, Wm. Graydon, Jacob Bucher, John Kean, John Dentzell, and Alexander Berryhill was appointed to wait upon Peter, John, and Abraham Landis and negotiate for the purchase of the mill property.

The following subscriptions were made by the citizens named to the mill-dam fund, independent of the amount assessed upon their respective properties at the town meeting:

"We, the subscribers, do promise to pay the sums annexed to our names, to Conrad Bombaugh, Esq., as a gratuity towards paying the expense of the purchase or the reduction of the mill-dam on Paxtaug Creek, next the borough of Harrisburg, and that when called upon. Witness our hands, Jan. 21, 1795:

The committee called upon the Messrs. Landis and tendered them for their property the price demanded the previous year, which they indignantly refused. The owners now asked two thousand dollars for their water-right alone, and a much greater sum for their entire property than the committee felt inclined to give. Apprehending that the owners of the mill property intended to take advantage of the situation to extort an unreasonable price (£4112 10s.) from the people, Galbraith Patterson, a noted lawyer of his day, in the Oracle of Dauphin of March 23d, gives the following as his views of the situation:
